(19) The King then at Counter, being by such sowres as hee had appointed for that service, presently advertised of Lamberts arrival, and having his forces ready vnder the conduct of Tasfer Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Oxford, because delay in this case was on all hands repeated mischievous, sets forward to Nottingham, and by a wood side called Donr, encampeth his people; in whom there appeared a gallant forwardnesse to reuenge themselves by the sword of that indignity, which was offered to the English name by strangers and rebels, who durst hope to give them a ruler. Thither repaired George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, George L. Strange his son, Sir John Cheine, and other noble and valiant Gentlemen with their numbers, which added no small sinesse to K. Henries numbers. Poynder hath diligently set downe the names of such principall men in those parts as repaired thither, partly voluntary, partly first sent to the common defence of the King and Kingdom; but without due additions of each mans degree and place of precedency i yet their names doe well deserve to be remembred, both for the honour of their Families, and examples of loyalty. He recounteth sixty five Captaines which assembled from places thereabout, vnder whom there cannot probably be thought fewer Souldiers then eight or ten thousand, the English usually, till of late, having commonly an hundred and fifty in a Company. Their surnames (besides Edward Lord * Hasting) are in him as followeth; Langford, Montgomery, * Vernon of the Pete, Shurley, Fulcher, Griffey, Sutton, Stander, and Stanley, Houghton, Astrey, Stanlop, Clyfson, Stepleton, Willoughby, Perpaine, Balington, Beyley, * Braden, Martham, Morbury, Borough, Tyrant, Hafey, Sheffield, Newport, Ormesley, Tompel, Kynett, Willoughby, Dybbey, and Dybbey, Harrington, Sachemerd, Vylers, Bylding, Poultery, Vard, Gryme, Caryon, Lucy, Belknap, Thurgerton, Grey of Kitchin, Wolsten, Poynder, Philp, Cleary, Cotton, S. John, Mordant, Terrill, Rainford, Paynton, Daniel, Murray, Armidale. From the vttermost bounds of the North, there repaired also other chiefe perform and leaders (saith he) as * Ogle, * Newble, a Lutmer, Bulmer, Langford, Narver, Nayls of Northshire and Williams. The Earle of Lincoln neuerthelesse comes forward with his Counter-king, nothing perhaps adding greater courage to that side, then the example of Henry himselfe, who with lesse numbers (but much more secret Art) prevailed in a night field at Besford: his meaning was to get into Notwiche. The King wakefull upon all aduantages, and perfectly intructed of his enemies courtes (whom desperation did thrust forward to a daring hope) dislodged with his Army, & passeth through Newburie, leaving it behind him about 3. miles, to intercept the Lambertines, and there sits downe againe. The Earle of Lincoln encamps with great haierie and shew of courage in the face of the Kings forces.

(20) The next day both the Armies are brought forth to fight, next to a little village called Stoke. The Earle of Lincoln marshalled his people by the aduise of Cornell Swart and others, to the best advantage upon the brow or hanging of an hill expecting the charge. The Almans were all of them hardie and approved men, and thoroughly well-appointed, and so in likelihood were such English as stood for that side but the Irish, besides mulcades and fierce-ness, had small provision, save (after the rude manner of their Nations) darts, spears, or the like. The maine of the Battell relied wholly vpon the English and Almans. King Henry on the other side, (as hee that thirsted for an end of this bloody daies worke,) speedily disposed his whole numbers into three Battailions: the Voward whereof was best replenished with flore of choise and picked men, well armed and appointed, and furnished with wings. The Armie being thus ordered, Andrew saith that King Henry vieth this speech.

(21) Most faithfull Lords, and you most valiant "Companions in Armes, who haue (together with "vs) endured so great perils by Land and Sea; lo, "we are againe against our wils, drawne to try our "fortunes in another Field. For the Earle of Lin- "coln (a perished man) without any occasion mini- "stered by vs, defends an vnjust quarrell against vs: "whether doth hee is diffemblyng, but most openly "impudent, without any feare of God, not so much "onely to endamage vs, as to fulfill the humor of a "giddie, and intemperate-tongued woman, who is "not ignorant that her blood was extinguished by "her brother Richard; but because that line adai- "waies maintaine a most deadly fiewd against ours, "there (without any great regard to her Neece, my "dearest Consort) alliaies to destroy a self vs as our "posteritie. Yee see therefore how often we are "provoked by them, but they shall not carrie it a- "way vnruegued. God therefore and his holy An- "gels we first call to witness, that we are proudent "both night and day for your safetie, and for the "Common quiett; though thus the ancient enemy "repugneth. But God, a iust, strong, and patient "Iudge, will also bring a remedy to this euill. In the "meane time we exhort and admonish you, that the "consideration of our iust inheritance be at this pre- "sent more forecable with you, then their wicked- "nes; neither doubt, but that the same God, who in "the former warre made vs victorious, will enable "vs to triumph ouer also ouer these enemies. Let vs "therefore set vpon them courageously; for God is "vpon our side to assist vs.

(22) The Earle of Oxford (on the behalfe of the whole Army) was prepared to make answer: but the King hastening to the prooff, brake off all Ceremonies, and the signe of Battell giuen, they thunder forward with showers of people, and found of martiall musicke, and like a blacke tempest, powethem- selves vpon the Front of the Enemies Battels: who rushed forward with equal violence and furie, as men that at once encountered against feare and fortune. The fight continued do befull about three houres. A long space for men of courage to be employed in killing one the other, and fit to glut the hunger of furie. The Earles English wanted nothing but a good cause, and the Almans gaue not place to the Kings people in any point worthy of gallant Souldiers, but sold their liues dearly and their Cornell Swart had scarce any before him in personall performance. Neither were the Irish behind for their parts, if their skinner had bene sword-prooffe, for the contempt of death was alike in them as the rest. Briefly, the wonder of that daies worke was, that Christian men, in no sounder a quarrell, could dare to die so boldly, chiefly as the Earle of Lincolne and some others, who knew the secret of that desperate enterprize. But God, the Lord of reuenges, punishing their vnjust malice, with a suddaine whorle-wind crying in the head of the Battell, (even as when Constantine fought against the Enemies of the Church) our Souldiers, who seemed vanquished, became victorious. For the Kings vanguard reinforced it selfe, and gaue so furious a recharge, (in likelihood vpon this encouragement lent as it were from Heuেন) that it vtterly brake the Enemies squadrons, and gubing in among them with full random, slew first such Cap- taines as resisted, and put the residue which yielded vnto, either to the sword flight. Herewith the whole Armie shouted, the trumpets found victorie, and the generall cry runnes King Henry, King Henry. When the battell and chafe were ended, so that there was time and leisure to view the field, it then appeared what mindes the slain bodies carried for all the chief Captaines, the Earle of Lincolne himselfe (though the King would gladly haue had him sa- ued, to come thereby to a greater light of his dan- gers) the Lord Lowell, Sir Thomas Broughdon, Cornell Swart and Maurice Fitz-Thomas, Generall of the Irish, were (like Cadwalla and his Complices) found to couer those places dead, which they defended li- uing, among foure thousand other Souldiers which were slaine vpon that side. The King at this battell lost almost halfe the People in his Vanguard, and Surgeons had flore of worke among the Suruiuers, so that the Garland gained at this Iourney was not vnripe in blood; Howbeit there is no mention that any man of honor or speciall note, fell vpon the Kings side.

(23) Among the Prisoners was the Counterfeit himselfe, and the lewd contriuer of this wicked Strata-agem, Richard Simon, who with little changemay most truly be called another Simon. The King (who referred himselfe in this battell, (as in others, but "neuer retired) made both their perfous examples of his clemency. For Lambert being questioned, how such a breaching-boy as he was, durst attempt so great a wickednes, denied not, that hee was compelled thereto, by certaine bad persons, who were of that conspiracie, and as for his parents quality, hee enswore them to bee such as indeed they were; allegating of base and despicable calling. Sim himselfe, or Sir Richard Simon the Priest, whether for discouery of some great secrets, or the extraordinary reuerence borne to his sancti- on (extraordinary say we, for otherwise Priests had bene openly pit to death) was not executed, but condemned to a dungeon, and perpetual shackles. Lambert (whom the glittering petting of regall style did but barely so adorne) was condemned to the Kings kitchen, there to manage spits at the fire, who if hee met and first had answered his late Titles, would haue chosen much rather to haue bene turned from the Ladder by an hangman. But having in this abiect condic- ion giuen sufficient prooffe that hee was but a Pupper, or a property in the iuracratical motion, hee was at length (promised we cannot say) made one of the Kings Falconers, in which estate it seemes he liued and died inglorious. This battell was fought vpon a Saturday day of the weeke which is obser- ued to haue bene fauourable and luckie to this Henrie. His first care after the victory felde, was that which most became a religious Prince, the humble and ioyous acknowledgement of thanks to God, in the very place. From thence hee passed to Lincolne, where he spent three daies in publike supplications, processions, and thanksgiuings, and sent his Standard to our Ladies Church at Walsingham in Norfolke, there to remaine as a Mouement of his victorie and grate- tude. Such as were taken in the Battell or chafe, are then executed. From Lincolne hee proceeded into Yorkshire, where hee tooke a stuer course aswell by exorcismes, as transme, for purging those parts from such as were culpable, or probably dangerous. At Newcastle about the middle of August, he dispatched his experienced and traly Agent Richard a son Bilshop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgcombe Knight into Scotland, there to settle a peace with King James the third, to empach the retreat and protection, which his enemies and rebels found therein. Him- selfe having spent a great part of Summer in this progreffe, or rather itinary Iusticing, retournes by Leicester toward London. Those prudent Ambas- sadors factor in the mean time negotiating with the Scotch King, wrought * him to be more inclinable to a perpetual peace; then it stood with his safety to let his Subjects understand, who favoured him not. Seven yeeres since is conlortio voto, with a secret promise of King James to renew that term, as it began to expire; with which assurance the Ambassadors returning, gladdened their wife Sovereignes heart; who thereby found that the Bishop of Exeter, then he had been pendent in furthering Hamvinto it. The firebrands and readiest fuel of Rebellion thus seemed to be quenched, and the King beholds himself in the Grace and favour of his people, not lesse of foreign Princes, Margarett Dauchess of Burgundy (his implacable * Jane) excepted; whom the news of her Nephewes the Earle of Lincolnes death, and the bloody blowing up of all her late hopefull and collyb contriements, did gally and wound extremely; but added fresh appetites of revenge to her former immortal malice, which a never ending our working, till she had vented another no lesse prodigy then Lambert was. But the King being honoured and fought vnto, as well by a Nuncio * from the Romanee See, who obtained leave to publish a Croisado here against the Turkes, as also from the French; after his many labours, as well Martialis as Civil, sustained on behalfe of himselfe and the Common-weale, makes a triumphall * entrie into Berlin, which was adorned in the best manner. And to the same moneth vpon * Saint Katherine day, his wife Elizabeth was Crowned Queen of England, as if that then first he had held himselfe assured of Royal estate; for he saw not what dangerous luffs would yet beguieen by that inuict Ladies praides, to heave him out of authority.

(34) The next maine action which lifted the judgement, and ride the sionewes of King Henry, was a forraigne case of more difficulty and Art, then of intestine danger, as in which the high and paramount respects of Common weale were intangled, or encountered with offices most necerly concerning the honour of a Princes minde, which neuer is more blemished then with the note of ingratitude. A dispute and combat betweene wisdom and blood, publick and private, (if any quality, or action of a King may be said to be private) which seemed worthy of so excellent, clear, and considerate a discourse, as that of Henries. You heard what noble fauours and humanities, when he liued a banished Earle in the Continent, he had received, first of the Duke of Britaine, then of Charles K. of France; so that he stood equally (as it were) obliged to them both, & could acknowledge no lesse. Charles (more ambitiously then iustly) desired exceedingly to annex Britaine to the Crowne of France, taking occasion of the time, and other circumstances, which all seemed to conspire with his affection. The Duke old, and the father of one onely daughter surviving till marriage; Maximilian King of Romans, and rival of King Charles in the same desires, (as well for the Dutchy, as the daughter,) feeble in meanes; and King Henry well obnoxious to the French for benefits, as he had in his particular at home; and the Duke of Britaine, by succouring Lewis Duke of Orleans, and other French Lords, whom King Charles repudied his adherencies, committed to the French an occasion (or colour at least) of warring vpon Britaine, and so by the apt concurrence of circumstances, to annex it by conquest, if by treaty he could not. Henry of England, now knowne to be victoriously fed, feared worth the Counting. Ambassadors come from the French, who lay open the wrong offered by the Britaines, in succouring the enemies of France, put Henrie in minde of passed benefits; and pray his assistance, or at the least a neutrality; but altogether concealing the mystery of this ware, which was to annex Britaine to the Crowne of France. Howsoever, Henry, though he well enough knew, that a King must ever be the best part of his Councell, (for what are others opinions, if himselfe want the happinesse, or lodgement, to chooe the best?) propounds the points to his priuy Councell, whereupon be Christianly offers himselfe a Mediator betweene the French and Britainian office, in which it was apparant he might best settle all obligations and duties both to God and them. The French pretend liking, but in the mean time follow their desire hard. Henry lends his Chaplen, Master Christopher Frythier a man * whom he very often imploied. The French make out. Things come to some extremities. It becomes manifest that King Charles abused the King of England's credulity; for the City of Nantes in Britaine was brought by siege to point of yielding, while messengers, and puckets, outwardly oiled with the name of peace, slide to and fro, and the French doubt nothing so much, as lest the English should stirre, before their victorie had made Britaine irreuerentable. The Lord Wendole (as without the Kings will, or pcuty) slips out into Britaine with three or foure hundred chafie men to assist the Duke, and came time enough to beefline with almost all his Souldiers, at the battel of Saint Albion, where the French wanne the day; notwithstanding that the Britains, the rather to appall their enemies, had paralleled * seuentee hundred of their owne Souldiers in white Coates with redde Croffes, after the English manner, and made thereby a shew of two Regiments of English. The Britaines had a great losse in that battel, wherein they were made fower by fixe thousand. The Duke of Orleans and Prince of Orange, who then were British in faction, were taken Prisoners in the same fight. The French lost about twelue hundred, and their General an Italian. So that the state of Britaine seemed ripe for a fall.

(35) But King Henry, having long since suspected, and foreseen, what the worst mark of the French might be, and seeming to have enough suffered the interell, which they might expect in him as a man, to be abused by their praides to the prejudice of his other friend, the Duke of Britaine, (who forgate not to sollicit and urge that point,) had made the quality of this affaire known to the body of State in open Parliament, for that purpose assembled; as meaning by authority thereof to purge himselfe from all imputation, if, as a King, he did that which the reason of Government required, which would not assent, that Britaine should be made French, left by that accession their Neighbourhood might grow intolérable, Britaine being so many Sea-terms and Outlets to mischeefe the Englishs traffike. Himselfe was otherwise also sufficiently resolved, that the general good ought to predominate the particular, and that his private obligations ought not to entangle, or prejudice the publick service. The Parliament therefore, considering that which stood for the Common-weale, decrees aide of men and money, on behalfe of the Duke of Britaine; it being (besides all other respects) a perillous example, to suffer the great to deuoure the lesser Neighbour States, vpon pretences of iustice, or revenge. Forces are leued; but (for respect of King Charles, and in hope that the shew of preparations would stoope him to equal conditions, not yet so roundie, as the Britains necessities expected. Meane while that no formality or Princely Ceremony should be vnaccomplished, King Henry by his Ambassadors certifies King Charles of his Parliaments decree; prays him to desist from further Hostilities; otherwise that he must assist the Duke, but yet (for the French Kings sake) with this reformation, of performing his subiects no where but in Britaine. Charles made small account of these overtures, because hee truly perwaded himselfe that the English aides would not arriue in season; which fell out accordingly; (for before that time, the French had gotten that victorie, (whereof cues now wee speake) at the Battell of Saint Albion. Brooke Generall, Sir John Cheyny, Sir John Middleton, Sir Ralph Hilson, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Lazenby, and Sir Edmund Cornwall Knights, and Colonels. The whole Army contained eight thousand men. These march toward the enemy; who, acquainted with the temper of the English, whilst they are free, as being then almost insensible, containe themselves within their Campe; but yet a noleth the English with continuall skirmishes on horsebacke in several places at once; finally to the profit of the French, who were alwaies put to the worke, the Archers received them with such perpendicall shot. In the meane space, Francis Duke of Britaine dies, leaving in effect, one only daughter, the Lady Anne, (for the other, being the younger) deceased not long after. This altered the whole face of the case. The British Nobility (under their young Mistresse) immediately fall at variance among themselves, and the English thereby were on every hand in danger: so that God (as it appeared by the sequel) had defined Britaine to bee annexed to the Crowne of France; for the English (after sixemonths stay) were in wisdom compelled to returne; the rather, for that Winter now was come upon them, and Britaine, destitute of competent defence, (her Rulers disagreeing among themselves) was finally by the marriage of King Charles with the Lady Anne, made a parcel of the French Monarchy, as hereafter will appeare.

(26) King Henry the while was againe in danger to have had present vie of Souldiers at home. Wee steered, what care was becomen taken by him to weede the North, and free it from lurking enemies. That notwithstanding, when the Earle of Northumberland, (Lieutenant of the North) signified at an assemblie (according as the truth was) that the King (though the Northern people had befoight us) would not remitte our prayer of such Subsidy, as was granted in Parliament for supportation of the warres in Britaine: left the Acts of State should be reuered at the rude peoples pleasure; but that on the contrary Commission and warrant was sent downe for him to see the same levied by distress, or otherwise: the desperate multitude, falsely supposing that the Earle was the occasion of such an answer, did suddenly set upon him at the Church near of one John a Chamber, and furiously murdered him, with certaine of his servants in a place called Cock-legge by Thrusell, eightene miles from York. They to carry their wicked attempt through, make head vnder Sir John Egremont, a discontented Knight of those parts, openly declaring where they came, that their meaning was to fight with the King in defence of their liberties, as if the causelesse killing of a most noble Lord had beene one of them. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey sent from Court with some forces to repress their increase, skirmisheth with a rout of these Rebels, beats them away, and takes John a Chamber prisoner. The whole swarme flockes to York, where they rooked about three or foure daies, when hearing of the Kings approach (who was euer one of the first in the necke of such occasions) they scattered themselves, but the ring-leaders were hanged and quartered, and John a Chamber, with some others, were executed at York after an extraordinary manner. Sir John Egremont escaping, fled to the common Center of all King Henries dangers and enemies, Margaret Duchesse of Burgundy, to that though the colour of rising was about money, yet Egremont at least had reference, it seems, to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, vpon the old ground of quarrell (hated of the Lancasterian Familie) and this to bee but a sparke or flint of that great and troublesome fire, which afterward brake forth and blazed so prodigiously. The Earle of Surrey is left by the King (having severely punished the murderers) Lieutenant of the North, and Sir Robert Towfild Knight, as chiefe Commissioners for leuying the tax or subsidie.

(27) The unworthy death of the Earle of Northumberland was seconded by a more unworthy, of James the third King of Scotland, so as King Henrie lost at home a most honourable stay of his Northern affaires, and a sure Ally abroad. This unfortunate Prince, hating by some irregularity of life, and parricides, and errors of government (amplified perhaps by the contradictions and reports of his malignant Subjects) incurred extreme hatred with many of the Nobility and people, laboured with King Henry, as also with the Pope, and King of France, to make an accord betweene him and his Mutinallies, for that they had compelled Prince James, his sonne, to be the titular and vnnatural Head of those armes, which traitorously (as pretending to haue a right on behalfe of the Common-weale to depose an euill King) they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their mediations by earnest Ambassadors, but could obtaine no other then this outrageous answer: That there was no talking of peace, unless he would renigne his Crowne. King Henry and King Charles vehemently protested against these their whole proceedings, declaring by their Ambassadors, that they thought the same to be as a common injury done vnto themselves; & the example to be very wicked and pernicious, and not sufferable by France, that Subiects should be permitted to put hands vnto their Soueraignes. Herupon it came to a Battell at Banockburn by Strimelin, wherest K. James (valiantly fighting before his whole numbers were come) was (notwithstanding the contrarie commandement of the Prince his sonne) slaine in the Mill of that Field, whither he fled after the battell ended. By reason of this infortunate precipitacion of the Scottish King, Hadrian de Castell an Italian Legate, whom Pope Innocentius the eight had sent to take up the cruell quarrell, came too late, (for he arrived not in England till the battell at Banockburn was passed,) but not too late to receive honour at the hands of King Henry, who respecting his wisdom and excellent learning, (vpon the speciall commendations first of John Meriton Archbishop of Cantuarbie, but afterward vpon his owne experience of the man in sundry employments to the Roman Sea,) bestowed vpon him the Bishopricke of Hereford, and (after resignation thereof) the Bishopricke of Bath and Wells; who was also at the length created Cardinal by Pope Alexander the sixth. But who is here among many thousands (saith Polyd.) that wist not to admire these outward honours which may like be giuen to the contrary as well as to the well-deserving, and may like be taken away from either? But the praise of this Hadrian is of another farre more noble kinde and eternal: for he was the man who first reuined the glory of the ancient Latine eloquence, and of all other sorts of abstract and cogitate learning, as in which himselfe excelled. Thus doth Polyd. (himselfe an Italian,) celebrate the learning of his Country-man, of whose other qualities, yet others write more harshly; as that out of meere ambition to be Pope (without any other grudge) hee conspired, with Alphonsus Petrucci, and other sacred Cardinals, to murder Pope Leo the tenth: induced thereto by suggestion of a Witch, who foretold him that one Hadrian, an old man, of meane parentage, of great Learning and wisdom, should succeed in the Papacy. The man thought it must needs be impossible, as being, though of very base Parentage, yet of some noble qualities: but another Hadrian, the sonne of a Dutch Brewer, and instructor of Charles the fifth the Emperour, proved to be the man; and this our Hadrian lost by deprivation all his promotions whatsoever, for his nefarious attempt. Into such extreme folly is learning and wisdom metamorphosed, where it is tainted with Ambition, or wants a Religious discretion to manage it aright.

(28) And albeit the King himselfe could verie hardly haue spent his time in the studies of peace, as those

those which were farre more apt for the service of God, and for attaining of knowledge, then in martiall tumults; yett the quality of his supereminent place enuired vnto him that felicity; for he was necessarily drawne into a warre with France vpon lesse occasions. Anne the young Dutcheffe of Britaine, (by their aduise, who affected to preclude the liberty of that Dukedome, which by union with France, would be absorpt & extinguished,) had so farre entangled and engaged her selfe with the Procurators of Maximilian King of Romaine, that shee was not only publicly courted, but contented (for vttermost performace of those rites whereof marriage by proxy was honorably capable) to take vpon her the Bride, and being solemnly bedded, to permit Maximilian Depuie, in the presence of sundry Noble witnessers a well meane women, to put in his legge, stript naked to the knee, betwene the spouall sheetes, that ceremony seeming to amount to a Consummation. Charles King of France, notwithstanding these solemnities, and his owne particular engagement with the Lady Margaret daughter of Maximilian, (whom for the purpose of marriage he had already entertained into France,) did so ambitionally and vehemently con- to gaine Britaine, that vpon confidence of his force, he resolved to breake through all respects, and not only to offend all his foreine friends, but to make them his iust enemies, rather then to faile in effectuation. Instruments are therefore very secretly set on worke, and batterie is placed with bags of gold at all the opportunities which might let in his purpose. Ambassadors also (the Lord Francis of Lorraine, Charles Marillac, and Robert Gaguine)

Generalles of the Order of the holy Trinitie, are dispatched to Henric, praying that with his good will he might dispose of the body of the Lady Anne in marriage according to the right which he had therein, as the chiefe Lord of whom she held the Dukedome. Henric denied the request, yet yielded notwithstanding to send Ambassadors into France there to Capitulat about a peace. The French carried this affaere with notable Art, for to diuert the world for looking into the depth of their dust, King Charles still detained the young Lady Margaret, Maximilians daughter, so as at last it could be but suspected, that Charles meant to match her with some of his blood, and all the entercourse of Orators and Ambassadors vied in the meane time, tended but to bold the English bound vpon other objects, till they had wrought their feat in the Court of Britaine. For Maximilian, (to let the world see what injuries shall be offered euen to Kings, that are not strong) him they altogether neglected; King Henry they played with, and Ferdinand King of Castile (who was ready to ioin with Maximilian and Henric against the French) they refused to appeale, with rendering vp vnto him the Countie of Ruffenme, and Perpignan according to what without reembarment of one penny of those 300000. Crownes, for which John King of Arragon (father to Ferdinand) had mortgaged them. The young Ladies doubte, rising either out of religion, or point of honor, his cunning Agents, and Emisaries wipe away with these solutions. That Maximilians daughter was not of yeeres to consent, and therefore the contract between King Charles and her, did not binde either in law, or conscience: That her owne contract with Maximilian was void, for that it was done without the consent of her Sueraigne Lord, King Charles, whose ward or Client shee was. The Ladies vanquished in her iudgement with these reasons, attracted with the present greatness of King Charles, and loath by refusal to make her Countrey the seat of a long and miserable warre, secretly yielded to accept of another husband. Thomas Goldflow Abbott of S. Augustine in Canterbury, and Thomas Earle of Ormond in Ireland, King Henric Ambassadors into France, being bene dandled by the French during these illuse practices, returned without other fruite of their labors.

(29) What could now the most patient doe lesse then take sword in hand vpon so palpable and vnworthy illusion? But Maximilians wrongs were too impudent and intolerable; for Charles from home the Lady Margaret, and married the Inheretrix of Britaine, annexing it to his owne Realme; whereas King Henric found himselfe rather mockt, then otherwise empairod. James Contehold hereupon comes Ambassador from Maximilian, and obtained his request, which was, that they might force should by a certaine day professed, made the French, in full reuenge of these their bold pronouciations; Maximilian for his part, promising to support that warre with at least ten thousand men for two yeeres. King Henry baving formerly in abundant manner prouided himselfe of treasure, was ready before the day with a roiall army: but Maximilian (whose will to worke the vttermost mischief to France was not doubted,) being sent vnto by King Henry, signifying his forwardnes, was found vtterly vanquished. Causes of Maximilians weaknesse in late, were the rebellions and dislikes of his Flemish Subjects cherished by the French, the seclusiue of Princes neighbourhood making them vniually glad either of others molestations. For subduing whereof King Henry had heretofore given him good and successful assistance vnder the conduct of Giles Lord Drombrey Governour of Calles, the Lord Marley and others, whereby he the rather outcame; yet was hee the feeblar, as then, by reason of so fresh exhaustures. King Henry with good cause was not a little troubled at these newes, secretly signified by his trustie Almer M. Christopher Pfrerick, and Sir Richard Rysley knight, his Ambassadors to Maximilians. For hee was very loath to vndergoe so great an Action vpon his particular strengths, though he doubted not to finde a potent party among the Britaines, (whose affections were as yet loosely fetled vnto King Charles,) and yet farre more loath to deuide the expectation of his owne people, who had so largely contributed; Chieflly the City of London, one of which, euen in those daies he recruited for his furniture in that voiage almost ten thousand pounds from the Commoners, and (as it seemes by our Author) two hundred pounds besides from enery Alderman, where the same King could not, but with some difficulty, leue in the third yere of his Reigne a loane of ffortie thousand pounds, whereof three of the best Companies are noted (as for baising done and deferred extraordinarily) to haue lent about nine hundred. And verily this wise King (knowing how great a strength that rich City was vnto him) humored that people with all sortes of popularities, for himselfe did not onely come among them, and capte himselfe to be censured a brother, in one of their Companies, but wore the habite of a publicke fast, and late as he faister, as is verie credibly reported out of the Records of their Hall. His wisdom therefore saw, that in gaining over the inuasion of France he should sloathfully abandon a goodly occasion of making himselfe vniuersally acceptable to his people. His resolutions therefore are by him at leastwise pretended to continue, and for that cause he sufficiently encreaseth his numbers, that he might seeme able to goe through with that enterprize alone, and though the time of yeere were too farre spent (for he landed not at Calles, till the sixth day of October) yet marcheth he with his whole forces toward Boulogne, being well assured that with this troupe he should at once plaister two wals, that is, hamor his English Subjects, and for a peace draw to himselfe store of Crownes from the French.

(30) He had with him besides the flower of his Nobility, and Captaines, innumerable numbers of People fit for the fruite. The most named persons were these, Jasper Duke of Bedford Lieutenant General of the Army, Thomas Marquisse Dorset, the Earle of Arundell, Oxford, Suffolk, Surrey, Bourne, Derby, Kent, Devonshire, and Ormond, sundry Barons, as Desrue-my, Abercromby, Delaplace, South, Hastings, Cobham, Ore. But it is needless to weary our selves with long relations of a short voyage; for King Henry, before he set forth out of England, was secretly dealt with by the Lord Cardus Governour of Henault, according to instructions from the French Kings behalf, to accept of conditions, which till Delaplace was besieged (as now by him it was) was not knowne. The ignorance of this mystery made many forward Gentlemen to mortgage their lands, and runne into much debt for their fuller and braver furniture, in hope to get great matters in this warre, whereof to their griefe they found themselves deceived. In the mean time the Lrd Cardus having met at Calais with Richard Fox Lord Bilhoppe of Exeter, and * Giles Lord Dawbeney, the Kings Commissioners; after iust and long debate, concluded vpon Articles of peace betweene the two Kings.

(31) Delaplace was brought to some distresse, when by intercession of this agreement it remained safe and quiet: King Charles was chiefly moved to buy his peace at a deare rate, both for that the state of Britaine was as yet vnquiet, and for that hee meant forthwith to march into Italy for the conquest of the Kingdome of Naples; and K. Henry on the other side was not vnwillig, because Maximilian had failed, and Britaine seemed clearly possi-bilitie of euersion. To which may be added, a naturall, noble, and religious inclination in King Henry, to liue in amity with his neighbours; the inclination of new dangers, then in brewing against him by the turbulent, and vnappeacable Dutchesse of Burgundy, and * cherished by King Charles; and lastly, the enrichment of himselfe by recompensing the charges both of this, and the Burgundie warre out of the French elck where, whereby he should farre the better bee able to withstand all forraign practices, or domesticke outrages. As for the preferring of himselfe, and his honour with his Subjects, hee wanted not both true and honourable glories: Such as were the cure to auoid vnecessary effusion of Christian blood: the vices of his presence at home, besides many other: but his wildome in the carriage of this right weighty action was chiefly eminent in this, That he would not enter into Treaty, till he was in the field, and that with such a puissance, as was likely enough to force her vnder conditions; nor suffer the least signe of his secret willingness to peace, or inward doubt of troubles at home, to creep out as any cray or chink of his dissimulation or carriage, whereby he as farre outwitted the French fairly, as they formerly seemed to haue overwrought him subreily. Had they truly bene informed in those points, it is probable they might haue gone a cheaper way to work-for, besides what other Articles fouer, it was concluded, That Henry should * not quit his claime to France; but that for a Peace, which by the contract was only to continue during the two Kings liues, Charles of France should pay in present to Henry for his charges in that warre, a ioven hundred, forty and five thousand * Ducques, and twenty five thousand Crownes yearly toward the expences, which hee had heretofore been at in aiding the Britons. Which (by the English called Titbotes) was duly paid during all this Kings reigne, and also to Henry his son, till the whole debt was run out, thereby to preserve amity with England. There were moreover by Henrys consent, who was thus content to gratifie his Peeres (at another cost) not only present rewards, but also certain annuall pensions allotted to the chiefe Lords of his priue Councell. A course of bounty which might otherwise haue proved preiudicious to the seruice of the King of England, by engaging his Counsellors affections to the French: The liege of Burgundy lasted till the eighth day of No-uember, & Henry (in his Queens most tender, frequent and loosing lines, did the rather ingite to speedie returne,) having tried all his transmarine affaires, * arrived at Douer, from whence hee journied to Westminster, there to celebrate the Feast of Christmas. This voyage into France, affording no greater exploits then we haue heard, was celebrated by blind * Bernard with hyperbolical and well-borne verses not ordinary, in which directing his speech in honour of Henry, to the Henries he concludes,

Effugite ignis montes celos commingere Solis, Quadrupedes: Hec a primis ecce parant; Non opus est volucribus, si primas Apollo, Pauoris Admittit equos, et ipse Chocet, Principis hoc nostri vultus tamula abundè Lumina, crede mihi, Phœberece placit.

(32) The famous counterfeiance of Perkin Warberie, with which the braue of the Lady Margaret Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundy had long travelled, doth now beginne to disclofe it selfe, and make new businesses for King Henry. The inglorious glorie of the first inuention in his reigne of this kind of vexation, Lambert Simnel's person had giuen to his Master the wily Simon, so that our Dutchesse was but an imitatrix, and yet perhaps shee gaue not place in any point to the first example, or Archetype, according to the fortune of the first deuse, being no more successefull then it was, might reasonably haue deterred her from the deedition of a second: but whether it were an immortal enuie toward the Lancastrian race, or a burning zeale of aduancing one that might at leastwise beare the name of a Plantagenet, though by any sinister practice, as if it had bene lawfull to murther her ends (admit them iust) by any insinuous coules, shee resolves to erect another Idoll, as perceiving by the first, how notable an engine impolitarie was, to trouble Henry: being well assured, that England was full of corrupt humors, and ill-affections to worke vpon, not so much through the desert of her present King, as for that the dregges which naturally reside in the bottom of mens hearts, where most bloody and barbarous factions haue for a long time weltered, and worried one the other with various euent, were not clenched and avoided.
The Diuell therefore ready to furnish all attempts which may raise trouble, and mischief, easily fitted her. There was come therefore to her hands a youth adorned with such a shape, as might easily persuade the beholders was worthy of a noble fortune: he had thereunto a natural fine wit, and (by reason of his abode in England in K. Edwards dayes) could speake our language, as also some other, which hee had by a kind of wandering trauell obtained. This youth was borne (they say) in the City of Torrey, and called * Peter Warbeck, the son of a conuerced Iew, whose Godfather at Baptisme King Edward himselfe was.
The English in contempt (and for a note perhaps of his Ioraine birth) did afterward call him by a di-minutue of his name, Perkinus Perkin. Him the Dutchesse (as a fine peece of timber, out of which to carue a new Idoll) moulds by degrees, & makes him take shape according to that Idea, which shee had prefigured in her working imagination, before the which the late honours of her house conspicuous in three Princes (which altogether made not twenty and five yeeres of reigne) did so perpetually hover, as her soule could neuer take contentment, but in the hope that the house of York should againe be the dwelling place of Misery.

(33) Her offence against Henry wanted not many seeming reasons, but none so great, as that hee had slaine her own brother King Richard, who albeit he was there reputed murderer of her Nephewes, yet were they a degree more removed from her, and so lesse deere in likelihood then a brother; and how-soever shee might secretly detest, or beleeue the commitment of that parricide, yet could shee neuer brooke (feeling they were gone) that the reward of her brothers death, and that even to him who slew him, should be the Crowne of England, whereby not only her brother, but the whole male-line of her family was for euer to bee excluded; much lesse could shee (a Plantagenet) abide that Henry, who brought to the Crowne the surname of a newly raised Familie. These and other considerations in the breast of a Lady, bred vp in a dominating Family, her selfe a Dowager, in such a fortune, as in which shee was Paramount for the time, and absolute without controule, being carelesse withall of fauing for posterity, because shee was without a child, and in that regard the more abundantly stored with treasure; all which made her spirits ouer-boile with impatience and virulency; so farre forth, that hauing infused all her principles into Peter her creature vnder the Title of Richard Plantagenet, second son of King Edward the fourth (the most covertly lends him into Portugal, from thence to take his sea-ward flight, as elsewhere is related. Neuertheless, there will not (perhaps) want some, who in defence of the Dutchesse, had rather referre it to Magnanimity, and Noblesse of spirit, in seeking the honour of her house; which, if it might passe for such among the heathen, yet can it not among Christians; much the lesse, for that her duty to England, & the royall flourishing estate of her own Neece, the right beire, exacted at her hands a greater tendernesse.

(34) That Peter Warbeck should bee inflamed by her fauours, and encouragements, so dare in earnest the personation of a Kings sonne, seemes not a thing to bee admired; for there is in humane nature (which ties not her selfe to Pedigrees, nor Parentages) a kind of light matter, which will easily kinde, being toucht with the blazing hopes of ambitious propositions. He therefore vpon the first disclosure of himselfe, did put on so excellent a seeming, as might easily moue King Henry to bee ialous, whereunto the petulious pride might come at last; for there wanted nothing in the whole forme of the young vpstart, but only the confidence of a truth, and truth it selfe: which makes me call to mind * what one hath written of a goodly white Saphyre in Fonie, made by art so neerely to resemble a true Diamond, that with much difficulty, and but by one onely lapidary, it was discovered; which if it had hence graced with some great Princes, wearing, what could waite to haue made it passible for a very Diamond of great value? Peter came such from out of the Burgundian forge; and (if his parentage be receiued) assumed the image and resemblance of a King, being otherwise not so much as a meane Gentleman. Neuer can it be marvelled at, if such a Phantasm as this, did abuse, and trouble the common people of that time; for euen to such as do write thereof, it begets a kind of doubt (which without some little collection of their spirits doth not easily vanish,) it seeming almost incredible, that such a bloody play should meely be disguised and fauned; the discovery therefore was worthy such a wit as King Henries, and the poth it gaue to his sovereignty did thoroughly try his sitting, being of force enough to haue cast an ordinarie rider out of saddle.

(35) Therefore, it was the Dutchesses misfortune, that her intentions (if they were hers) had to encounter so politicke and consilia man as King Henry, whose prudence searcht into the abstrusest secrets, and whose diligence ouercame all difficulties. Yet the Lady Margaret couste to vent her Creature at the first was exquisite; for the (as in a Magicke practise) hauing kept him secret till shee full her time, causeth him to bee closely conuayed into * Portugal, from whence (attended with five associates and Priuadoers) bee sailles into Ireland (the Foller-place and nursery of immortal good will to the house of Turke) where (worthily standing their late calamities) he so strongly enchanted that rude people with the charmes of false hopes, and milke of seemings, as he was sure of partakers in great plenty. Charles the eight, King of France, bearing (and perhaps beleauing) that the Duke of Turke was alive, and glad to haue to probable an occasion of doing mischiefes to Henry of England, in regard of their flagrant enemies which euen remained vnuentured betweene them, inuities Duke Richard most officiously to Paris, and besides all other honours, assigned him (at his coming) a guard for his person, wherof the Lord Cornwall was Captain. Afterward there repaired to this new Duke, Sir George Newill Knight, (a * baillard of the noble house of the Neills), Sir Iohn Taylor, Rowland Holman, and about an hundred English, to whom (as a principal) wee may adde * Stephen Fryen, French Secretary to King Henry himselfe; all which, together with the whole Strategeme, was smacked out of France with the first graine of incense sacrificed vpon the Altars of Peace at Bolign, after the same was once made and ratified (as you haue heard) betweene the French and vs. The Dutchesse then seeing her artificiall creature thus turned againe vpon her hands, pretends an extreme ignorance that euer shee had sent him before that present, and an excessive joy for his miraculous escape, and preservation, which seemed such to her (as she pretended) as if hee had bene rescued from death to life, and that the same might want no quickning, which her personall countenancing, or her Court could afford, shee openly glazes him by the delicate Title of the * White Kefe of England, and questions him of the manner of his escape, with such like, to beget a firme belief in the hearers, that he neuer had seene him before that time, and that he was indeed her Nephew Richard Duke of Turke. The Nobility of Flanders accordingly, doe vnto him all honour, and shew enuious his person with a guard of thirty men in murrey and blew. Neither was hee in any point wanting to his part; but fitted such likely answers to all questions, and such princely behaviours to all occasions, as made firme bold to publish him with the fullest blast of his Trumpet, for no other then a true Richard Plantagenet, and as it is so obscured of some, that by long vsing to report an vntruth, at last forgetting themselves to bee the Authors thereof, beleaue it in earnest; so these honors making our Peter to bury in vster oblivion his birth or obliquity, he seemed to bee perswaded; that hee was indeed the selfe partie, whom hee did so exactly personate. Nonetley, and impudency were scarce euer knowne to haue found more applause, or beliefe, euen among many verie wise, and (otherwise) worthy men; who moued in confidence, and not onely vpon discontent, inclined to partake with this new Plantagenet, as the onely right heire of the English Diadem, as if, whether he had bene the true one, it was past dispute. This intoxication, & abuse of the world, was wonderfully exacerbad by the secret reuolt of Sir Robert Clifford Knight, whom (as one that had seene, and knowe the error Richard) the cunning conspirators in England had sent ouer, to informe himselfe, and them, whether he was indeed as hee seemed. Sir Robert (whose presence and errand were to the Dutchesse most welcome,) being brought to his sight, did forthwith give credite, and constantly signifie, that this was indeed Richard Plantagenet, the true Duke of Turke, and that hee well knew him for such. Mistray and encouragements, were hereupon sent out of England, from such as fauoured him; among whom was * Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain to King Henry; by whose punctual reuolt from K. Richard, hee had principally achieved the Crowne of England. * Iohn Ratcliffe, L. Fitzwater, * Sir Simon Menunsart, * Sir Thomas Thwaites Knights, and others; but the maine continuance of the cause in fortune parties was Sir Robert Clifford (a knight of an honourable fame and family) which moued the secret friends of the new Duke to set the rumor so cunningly on foot among the English, that * fewer might a word, which causeth thunder, bee caught or knowen, then the Author thereof; and multitudes being weakened therewith, bore of humor humor, dangerously prepared to mutation, did every where discover it selfe.

(16) For prevention therefore of all those effects, which might issue out of these causes, (being in their proper nature most generative of sedition, and of all sorts of civil furies) King Henrie diligently watcht the coasts of England to be well and strongly watcht, aswell to empêche the landing of enemies, as the escape of fugitives: but above all, he writes letters to his best friends in forraigne parts, & also employs nimble wits with severall instructions, some to assure the constancy of Sir Robert Clifford, (the maine stay and credite of Perkins cause) with promise of immunity and favour if hee would returne into England in quiet, others to find out the truth of Perkins quality, being furnished with treasure to draw and requite intelligences; and all of them (as occasion should serve) to pretend themselves vehement favourers of the new Duke. These necessary hypocrites and double faced Ambassadors, called Spees, (whose services, howsoever conductable to such as sets the on worke, yet their perfidious quality commonly partakes with that of Judas Iscariot, and often meetes with like reward,) doe plaie their charge so roundly that * Sir Robert Clifford is secretly drawne off, the new Duke is discovert aswell by them, as by sundry letters from friends abroad, to be but Perkin Warbeck, and many other mysteries are revealed. This gave to the wife King great satisfaction, who to weaken the enemies practice the more, not onely divulgeth the fraud, but sends over sea Sir William Paunings Knight, and Sir William Warham his Ambassadors to the Arch-Duke Philip, Duke of Burgundy (then gubnert by others by reason of his tender age) who promised not to assist the said Perkin, but if the Dutchesse Dowager would doe any such thing to the prejudice of King Henrie, it was not in him to hinder her, for that she might dispose of her owne. A maine argument vied by these Ambassadors before the Archdukes Councell to coynceine, that Richard the very Duke of Turke was murdered as well as King Edward his brother. † As Polydore (who seems to have had good meanes to understand these times) rehereth it, was, *That there would Richard should in youth have made away the elder brother, if the younger had become suffered to survive, for that the right of the elder, was immediately upon his death in the younger, and that consequently during his life, King Richard could have no more assurance, then if the elder were still alive: which Argument notwithstanding doth all most prove nothing but this: That their words the younger might intend, that both his Nephewes should be murdered, and hee knew nothing perhaps to the contrary. Whereas facts are to be proved by confessions of parties, by witnesss, or vehement presumptions, (though vehement presumptions are said to confute but an halfe proof) all which are * otherwise so supplied, as leave small cause to doubt of both their deaths. But if arthur (a learned Priest and Doctor in the lawes) the mouth of that Ambassador sent to the Arch-Duke, in the end of his oration vied this bitter scoffe, and sarcasme against the Lady *Margaret: That shee in her old age brought forth two Messieurs within the space of a few yeeres, and both of them not in the right, or month month after their conception, as naturall mothers, but in the one * hundred and eightieth month, and whereas other women bring forth infants utterly unable to helpe themselves, these brothers of hers were full strippling, and as soon as they were borne, offered battell unto mighty Kings. And albeit the Arch-Dukes answer seemed reasonable, yet was not King Henrie so satisfied, but that within a while after, for * that the Arch-Duke had secretly furnished Perkin with leaders, hee tooke occasion to banish all Flemings, and Flemish wares out of his Dominions, and inhibited his Subjects to trade in any Countries within the obedience of Maximilian King of Rome, or of the Archduke Philip his sname, who by way of talie and requitt did the like against the English.

(17) Lex vs come now from the addresses of things, to their doing. The high prudence and industry of Henrie having thus discovered the foundations of Perkins hopes in England, and the humors which were most vsuall, made it his first worke to raze those groundworks, and purge the vines of his Realme from that corruption by needfull Phlebotomie. The * Lord Fitzwater, a principall conspirator, being condemned, and sent to Calais, lured there in hope of pardon, but for practising with his Keepers to escape, hee finally payed his head for satisfaction. Sir Simon Montfort, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Durborn (Gentlemen of noble houses) as Captaine and Author of the conspiracy were beheaded, but all therewithal Clerkes as Lay-men had their pardons. Not long after these executions and pardons, the King upon sure intelligence, that Sir Robert Clifford (in whose bosome the secret of all Perkins plotting) was arrived, entered the Tower of London, and there continued; that so, if Clifford should accuse any of the great, (and whom hee then would accuse, it is probable King Henrie knew) they might without suspicion, or tumult be attached; the Court, and publike prison for crimes of highest nature, being then within the cincture of one, and the same wall. Sir Robert Clifford at his coming into the Kings presence, (though hee was secretly before assured of his life) most humbly praying and obtaining pardon, approached (among many others) Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine. The King would not at first give credite (or at leastwise pretended, not to give credite) to the accusation of a Peere so great, and so neere unto him: but upon farther search, finding the same confirmed with circumstances, and particularly, for that hee said to Clifford, * Hee would never bear Armes against the young man, if he knew him for certaine to be the sonne of King Edward, hee reioiceth to vnto severity against the delinquent.

(18) But Bernard Andreæ directly saith, That (besides bare words and purposes) Sir William had supported Perkins cause with treasure, wherein hee is recorded to have abounded, as that in his Castle of * Holt he had in coine and plate to the value of forty thousand Markes, besides lands of inheritance in sundry places about, to the yearly value of three thousand pounds; (a pretty stocke in treasure at those times, to uphold the first beuste of a warre, and a large extent of land to furnish the wing of a powerfull battell with able soldiers out of Tenants) with all which the able Anchor in plaine wordes saith, That hee was prouided to defend the said Pretender, and bring him into the Kingdome. And if we have any insight into King Henries disposition, it seems to vs, that before hee entered into the Tower, hee not onely knew the Lord Chamberlaine vsuall, but also that such quiet apprehension hee chiefly repaid thither. Stanley being herewith attached and referred to further examination, is said * *To have denied nothing of all that whereunto hee was charged, which hee perhaps the more confidently did, in hope that king Henrie would pardon him in respect of passed services, they (in their effects considered) being the greatest whereof mortality is capable, preservation of life, and gaining of a Kingdome. But the poore gentleman found himselfe farre deceived in his poincke: Lord and Master, who (to teach mankind thereby, how dangerous it is to make a King) was not vnwilling to cut him off, as perswading himselfe, that those services proceeded of ambition, not of affection, or if of affection, the cause now ceasing, the contrary effects might proue as pernicious, as the other had been advantageous and available. The King was unwilling to displease his Father in Law, Thomas Earle of Derby (brother german to Sir William Stanley) and did therefore for a while suspend his iudgement; but rigour finally prevailed, and hee was at Westminster openly arraigned, couicted, and after-* ward at the block on Tower-hill beheaded. In whose office Giles Lord Darnley a most faithful and moderate man succeeded. This sharpe iustice exercised vpon so eminent a person, was of great vie in the itay of peoples minds through the Realme of England. But in Ireland they were not so letted, or reduced, but that for the better and fuller purging thereof, Henry Dewy (a Monk of Lanigan Abbey) was sent Lord Chancellour thither, with orders and directions, and Sir Edward Poynings Knight, with souldiers; whose great diligence and cares were not wanting, to punish such as heretofore had aided Perkin, or might hereafter. The Earle of Kildare Lord Deputy, falling into suspition with Phynings, was by him apprehended, and sent prisoner into England; where the King did not onely graciously beare and admit his defences, but also returned him with honour, and continuation of authority. In the meane time (the error, or weaknesse of the Burgundian Dutcheffe and her Perkin, suffering their enemy in this sort, to purway for his own security and their depulsiō) bee yee for farther assistance of himselfe makes a progresse into Lancashire, there to recreate with his Father in law the Earle, and the Countesse his mother, where among all other his secret purposes, he thoroughly satisfied the Earle, both for the iustice and necessity of Sir William Stanleyes death.

(39) These certainly, were perillous times to line in, and vndoubtedly full of infinite isalouses, and hypocrites, not valike to those lately passed, * wherein there was nothing so plaine, and openly prynced, but that yet for the common custome of close and covert dealing, men had in their inwardly respect, as many well-counterfeted words make the true suspected: these generall difficultis being among the strange gradations, by which the incomprehensible providence doth vie to chastise insolent Nations and to make regular Princes, mee and absolute. But the Dutcheffe and her Perkin knowing all things as they passed in England, resolute notwithstanding to proceede; and therefore taking advantage of the Kings absence in the North, he with a force of broken and discontented perions, sets saile for England, and approacheth the coasts of Kent about Sandwich and Deal, there to beginne his enterprize for obtaining the Crowne of England, vnder the borrowed name and title of Richard Duke of Yorke, if he found the Commons forward. But they, though doubtful at first what to doe, yet at the last considering that his Souldiers were for the most part of desperate fortunes, and felonious qualitie, (though hardy otherwise, and approoved men of warre,) remembering withall the mischiefes of part-takings, would not adhere, but training them within danger vpon promise of succour, assaile, and drive them to their shippes, take five of the Captaines, Mansford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quinton, and Grenin, and * one hundred, sixty and foure others, which were all of them afterward executed. Perkin himselfe who would not trust his person on shore, being worthily troubled at the inaspicious fortune of his followers, presently hoisted sailes, and returned to his Lady Patrouelle and Creatrix, into Flanders.

(40) These newes being brought to the King, where he was then in the North, he is * said to have given God thanks, and declared his ioy in these words. I am not ignorant (most mercifull Iesu) how great victories thou hast given mee, vpon the Saturday at the prayers of thy most gracious Mother, all which I ascribe not to my deserts, but to the bounty of thy celestiall grace. Thou seest, I must benigne Iesu, how many sinners, how many devils, how many weapons, that terrible Iuno hath prepared, notwithstanding that after my marriage (soon I aming herselfe joyfull), hath faithfully promised to cleave towards all my sinners and good will, but shee, more changeable then the wind perverting all things afield divine as humane, fears not God, but in her fury seeks the utter ruine of her own blood. Thou, O God, who knowest all, deliver us also (if we forme worthy) from these evils, but if our finnes have deserved to suffer, doe thou, O Lord, thy good pleasure. Mercifully we are to thy Grace immortal thanks, which though with our tongue we cannot utter worthily enough, yet most they bee rendered. We are always of good courage, and so minded for certain, that no prosperitie, no adversity, no abundance, no diffidence of places, or times, shall once make us of thee commendable. The most modelt King hanaing ended his speech, doth forthwith (with our Author) ironically deliberate with his Councell what was to bee done hereafter. It may probably seeme, that he had withdrawn into the North, to inuise Perkin (by occasion of his absence) the rather to take Land, that so hee might draw all his dangers into one place, and decide them in a Battell, with his Subjects: he did reuolt to Perkin in any numbers, or if they did not, then might he fall into his hands, by landing vnwarily vpon trust of the peoples fauour, and so by a more compendious, and easie way settle his Estate; of which he failed but little, by the said counterpolicy of the Kentishmen. In regard whereof, in the first Act of Councell, praise and thanks were decreed to them, with which Sir Richard Gylford Knight was presently sent away, and order taken for the erection and watching of Beacons vpon the Coasts.

(41) The Dutcheffe on the other side, seeing the South of England prone to drie, and barren to her driftes, conceives againe her Idol into Ireland, where shee well knew there could not want partakers; and Perkin himselfe daring to entertaine the hope of a Crowne, (for by so long perfonation of a Kings sonne, and beire, ambition had throughlie kindled his youthfull blood) was now no little caule of bringing things to an issue by his owne forwardnesse. * Maximilian King of Rome, whether as one willing to keepe the English buid (Henry having forbidden his Subjects all traffike with the Flemmings, and all other of his sonnes the Archdukes Subjects,) or as crediting the fiction, and therefore thereunto in honour and confidence; * Charles also King of France, but specially the Dutcheffe of Burgundy, (by whom this bubble was first blowne vp, and put abroad) did concur to the molestation of King Henry * Maximilian, and the French King, more secretly, but the Dutcheffe with all her Oares and Sailes plied it in open vie. Botne vp by these supporters hee the rather easily drew the Irish to assent to his pretext; but his counsell weighing with themselves that the Irishmens friendship, how firme so euer, was insufficient in respect of their nakednesse and poverty to worke their willes, hee according to such advice as were taken before his departure from his Creatrix, crosseth into Scotland, for feare of punishment, saith * Andreas; if perhaps by the Kings true Subjects within Ireland hee should channce to bee apprehended; but the event shewes, that it was not onely for his more security, but principally to strengthen his enterprise with the Scottish aide, whereof in those daies hee had small reason to bee doubtfull; and his case was such, that no third course was left vnto him, but either to fight and conquer, or lye branded with immortal infamy both of Cowardize and impolitic. Henry hearing these things was not slacke to provide for his iust defence, greatly careful vpon what coast this wandering cloud would at length disfolde in life, in what effects loeuer; and therefore obserued all his waies with as much curiosity as was possible.

holding from them their rightfull inheritance, to the intent they should never be of might & power, to aid and assist us at our need after the date of their treasons. He hath also married by compulsion certaine of our Sisters, and also the Sister of our forefai'd Cofin the Earle of Warwicke, and diuers other Ladies of the blood royal, vnto certaine his kinsmen and friends of simple and low degree, putting apart all well-disposed Nobles, he hath none to favour, and trust about his person but Bishop Fox, Smith, Gray, Laue, Oliver King, Sir Charles Sommerfet, Danie Owen, Knylle, Sir John Trebutaile, Tyler, Chaucley, James Hobert, John Cuth, Garth, Henry Wynt, and such other Cautiues, and collages of birth which by subtilie inuention, and pelling of the people haue been the principall fonder, occassions, and counsailers of the misrule, and mischance new raising in England, &c. We remembering these peccates, with the great, and execrable offences daily committed and done by our forefai'd great emper, and his Adherents, in breaking the liberties, and franchises of our mother the holy church; to the high displeasure of Almighty God: besides the manifold treasons, abominable murders, man-slaughters, robberies, extortion, the daily pillage of the people by disloyal, traitors, traitors, beneuolences and other villainous impieties, and greuous exactions, with many other heinous offences, to the liberty destruction and defolation of the whole Realme, &c. shall by Gods grace, and the helpe, and assistance of the great Lords of our blood, with the Counsaile of other sad persons, &c. see that the commodities of our Realme be coupled to the most advantage of the same, the entrechaunge of merchandise betwixt Realme and Realme, to be misruled and handled, as shall more be to the Common weale, and profit of our subjects: and all such disloyal, traitors, pillages, beneuolences, villainous impieties, and greuous exactions, as be as be abhorred, to be foredone, and laid apart, and neuer from henceforth to be called upon, but to such causes as our Noble Princes, Kings of England haue of old time bene accustomed to haue the aide, succour, and helpe of their subjects, and true liegemen.

(40) The tide of people being thus vp: Flammeack and the Blacke Smyth (hauing firme promise of the Lord Audley personal helpe) led them forth tow and Kent, where they doubted not prently to encrease their numbers; and had in likelihood so done, but that the singular diligence and wisdom of the King, frustrated their hopes by fundry Princely Arts. Yet they flow on and to flow what they durst doe, they flew in their way at Tansford the Prouost of Perin, one of the Commissioners for the Subsidie; and marching forward without offering other violence, James Tanchet Lord Audley ioines himselfe at the City of Wels vnto them, according to secret agreement, and becomes their Generall. From Wels they proceeded to Salisbury, thence to Tanchester, and so toward Kent, where the Countrey was letled and provided. But the King further doubting that the Scots would take fresh occasion by these seditious vproores, to invade the borders of his Realme, dispatched Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey (a Peere of excellent vertue) to defend those parts, with the helpe of the Bishopricke of Durham, and the Marches, till these commotions were appeased, that then the Lord Denbigh might with a full and full Army prosecute the warre against the Scots. But James their King, perceiving the end of the English intestine warres, would be the beginning of his troubles, thought it best by way of anticipation to weaken his enemy before hand as much as hee could, and thereupon fiercely invaded Northumberland againe, and besieged Norham Castell belonging to Richard Fox, whom the King for his noble seruices and desert, had now advanced from Exeter, and Bath and Wels, vnto the Bishopricke of Durham. But the Scottish King, hopelesse to winne the Castell, though hauing done much hurt both to it and to the countrey, withdrew his people before the Earle of Surrey could approach with his Army, wherein was the Earle of Westmerland, the Lords Darcy, Strange, Nevill, Latimer, Lumley, Scrope, Clifford, Camper, Darcy, the Baron of Hiltone, and many Knights, as Percie, Bulmer, Guesaigne, Penington, Bygel, Berres, Elarker, Parr, Wharton, Strongworth, Constable, Ratcliffe, Somle, Gower, Mufgrave, Mallesie, Loder, Boweringham, Stapleton, Worsley, Pickering, Heron, Gray, Kilday, Griffith, Fowneiche, Ward, Strypeand, Blomgham, Carver, Worsop, Tompoff, Maltolfe, and others; who misting the enemy, marched after into Scotland, and took such reuenge as the thornesse of their lodaine promitions would enable.

(47) The Rebels on the other side, (whom King Henry thought not good to encounter in their first heats; but suffered them to tire their fury, and subuate themselves with a long march, the countreies as they past being forsake from ioyning with them) coming neere to Kent, found few, or no partakers there; but the Countrey strongly defended against them by the Earle thereof, the Lords Abergenie and Cobham, with other principall men and their followers; which made diuers of the Rebels secretly shrinke and abandon the enterprise. But the Lord Audley, Flammeack, Michael Ioffe, and the rest, kept on their way, and encamped vpon Blackheath, between Greenwich and Eltham, from thence whereof they might behold the Citie of London, & the whole beauty of that Horizon. Here they resolved to abide the King, or to assaile London. The King on the other side, by the diligence of the Lord Maior, and other the Magistrates secured the City, which was full of feare and businesse himselfe enured with his Nobles, & the choice of the South, hearing where the Rebell was encamped, resolved by dint of sword to deliuer his people from tiring expectations, and for that purpose marcheth out of London, and encamps in S. Georges field, where be lay that night. The next day when he understood that the Enemy had drawe forth his People, and set them in Battell-ray, he sends out Henry Tanchet Earle of Essex, Edmond de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Rics ap Thomas, and others, with certaine Cornets of horie, and Companies of Archers, to beset the hill, and the descent thereof, while Giles Lord Denbigh with the strength of his Army, chargeth the Enemy in front, whom with some slaughter they drawe from the Bridgiate Dersfere it and so then mounting the hill, he and the Earles charge the maine squadrons on all sides, and without much labour breake and defeat them. The number of the Rebels slaine is vncertainly reported, the odds being betwixt two thousand and three hundredth. The Kings army returned fewer by three hundredth. Fifteen hundred rebels were taken Prisoners, & the takers had their Prisoners goods granted them. James Lord Audley, Flammeack, and the Smith were taken and executed. To all the rest mercy was seasonably extended. The Lord Audley led from Newgate to Towerhill in a coat of his owne Armouries painted on a paper, reuerst and torne, there paid his head, for being a Head to that heady Route: Flammeack and the Smith were quartered. Memorably strange was the comfort, with which this Blacksmith is said to haue cheered vp himselfe at his being drawne to execution, saying, That yet he hoped thereby, that his name and memorie should be everlasting. Who could beleue, that the desire of a long-lasting name howsoever should take the affections of so meane a person? Such therefore was the end of this infurrection; but the times being queasy, the King wiselie forbore to take any seuerer reuenge vpon more then once vpon the chief Leaders, for he was trulle informed that this calamitie had not broken the willes of the Cornishmen, who remained ready for any desperate sudden occasion, and therefore he abstained from needlesse exasperations, in so much as charthe quarters of Flammeack, and the Smith being once appointed to haue beche set vp in Cornwal for terror, were only fixed about London, the King thinking good to temper his iustice euen in such a circumstance.

(48) His next care was so to order the warre against Scotland, that the Peace whose foundations he had laid a far off, might be made to his more honor: & because the injuries sustained by the youthful stout of King James, were too publike to be altogether forgotten; hee sent the Earle of Surrey, the Lord Howell, and others, to invade the Scottish borders with an Army, who purified the revenge with great vehemency. Meane while there arriveth in Scotland Peter Hyalun an Ambassador from Ferdinando and Elizabeth, King and Queene of Spaine, as from friends equally well affected to both parties, to mediate a peace betweene the two Kings of England and Scotland, which perhaps in their owne persons would not easily have beene brought about, the point of honour might thereto have given such empeachment. But this was the way to a peace which King Henry foresaw, there being not onely a strict bond of love betweene him and Ferdinando, but an overture, if not a secret conclusion, to match his eldest Sonne Prince Arthur with the young Lady Katherine daughter of Spaine, who for her excellent vertues was well worthy to be the happy wife of any Prince then breathing. Hyalun so handled the point of his employment, that an honourable truce followed. This Ambassador was a practicke man of much experience, and knew the better how to deale on the behalfe of King Henry against Perkin Warbeck, "an imaginary and Stage-play Prince" for that his Sovereigne Queene had also beene exceedingly molested by a Counterfeite. For Henry the fourth, King of Castile, and brother to Elizabeth, being unable to begette children, Joan (daughter of Edward king of Portugal) his wife found means notwithstanding to beare one, by occasion whereof, after King Henries death, for that it was borne in marriage, a dangerous warre was undertaken by "Alonso King of Portugal", on behalfe of Isabella the supposed inheritor but Troth, partly by force, and partly by mediation, was in the end victorious; and Elizabeth, or Isabella sister of Henry succeeded to her brother, and brought the inheritance of the Kingdomes of Castile and Leon, with her to Ferdinando King of Arragon. The chiefe point of this truce with Scotland was, That Perkin Warbeck should leave that Kingdom, seeing King James, standing upon his honour, would not detur him up to King Henry. Perkin having now no remedie, did accordingly, taking with him his wife, the Lady Katherine Gordon; and with such few as remained to him, past into Ireland, where hee had not continued long, but the Cornishmen offer to rise at his arrival, and to aduocate their fortunes, and lives in his quarrell: Which motion Perkin gladly entertained, as perceiving yet some little hope left to maintaine himselfe, by the troubles, and hazards of others: but the policie and fortune of King Henry were growne so venerable with the Princes his Neighbours, that Ambassadors came from France, and from the Arch-Duke of Burgundy, the one to treate amity, the other to request the restitution thereof; both which K. Henry (who repoyed his whole trust next under God, upon the amity of his neighbours) granted, and the English Merchants (who had been somewhat long forbidden by their Sovereigne to trade in the Arch-Dukes dominions) returning to Antwerp were received into the same with procession: so that Perkin could scarce cast his eye upon any place, not onely where to raise aides, but not where to rest his head, unless perchapp in the Court of the Dutchesse of Burgundy, neither in all his fortunes did any thing seeme miserable or unworthy, but the great infelicity of his wife, whose beauty, birth, and honourable qualities ought not to have bene so betrayed by her friends temerity. Perkin hereupon landing at Whyland Bay in Cornwall in September, found means afterward at Bodmin to raise some thousands of people, whom with multitude promises, inettive proclamations, and strong impudency, he held together under the Title of Richard the fourth King of England, whose face was none of the happiest, while the maicesty of her name might so be played with by impostors. Perkin thus accompanied, marcheth toward the City of Exeter, purposing if hee could winne it by force, to entrich his Souldiers with the spoiles thereof, and to intice all other loole or lost people to his service by the hope of like booties, and by taking into his possession such places of strength as lay in his way to secure his retreat, if (according to the ordinary fortune of warre) any thing should happen to him unluckily.

(50) But the King (hearing that the varlet was landed, and againe made head against him in Armes upon trull of the Cornishmens assistance) is fild to "have smiled, vnto these words: "Loe, wee are againe provoked by this Prince of Rabelles, but lest my people should through ignorance bee drawne into destruction, as let vs seeke to take this Perkin by the easiest wayes we can." Reason hee had to smile, for now hee seemed to see the bottom of his perill, and as it were to hold his enemy compounded within the English Ocean, it being a perpetuall and noble wish of his, that he might looke his dangers in the face and deale with them hand to hand, as the necesse cut over to a full conclusion. Hee therefore provides accordingly, assembling his forces, and his wits (no lesse to be dreaded then his forces) sending forth his espials into all parts to observe the tracks, and hopes of this empty cloud, which is now fene before Exeter, a principall strength and ornament of the Western parts of the Kingdome. Parke, and the alluements of wordes under the guile title of King Edwards Sonne, prouing vnauailable with those resolute and faithful Citizens: Perkin forthwith betakes himselfe to violence, sets fire on the gates, mounts his scaling ladders against the walls, and with his vtmost fury labours to force a suddaine entrance, for that as hee suspected, succours could not long be wanting. The Citizens on the other side, and such of the Country, as came in, prepare, and make a very valiant defence against the Rebell, and in stead of quenching the fires kindled by the enemy at the gates, to open a passage (for they had not Canon or any other Ordinance) the Citizens threw on great store of fagots and faell, and so with flame did shutt up the way, when the gates themselves were now consumed, and in the mean while they cast up trenches, and man their walles, from whence, with the slaughter of about two hundred Rebels at this assault they valiantly deafe them. Such messengers as by cords slippe downe the walles, to signify their perill, sped toward the King; but the loyal diligence of "Edward Courtney Earle of Devonshire", the Lord William his sonne, with many principall Gentlemen of those parts, as Trenchard, Curry, Fulford, Halwell, Creker, Edgewood, Semar, followed with great store of Souldiers, flued him the labour of a personall rescue by timely approach.

(51) Perkin hearing thereof, riseth from before Exeter, and marcheth to Taunton (a goodly town not far off) thereto take the mullers of his Armie, and to provide for encounter, where he found very many blanks in the list of his numbers, for that they had secretly shrunke away, as misdouing the sequel, the Earle of Devonshire being so neere at hand with the power of the Country, and the King upon his way against them, with the maicesty and terror of a roiall name and Armie, none of the Nobilitie (which was chiefly hoped) comming to their aide. Perkin nevertheless makes shew of standing, with such as were left vnto him. The Earle of Devonshire marching towards Taunton, in the way there came vnto him Edward Duke of Buckingham, a young Lord full of great honour and courage, followed by a goodly troupe of Knights, and others excellent well appointed, both for their owne persons, and their found them already regitred; but a ing watch about it day and night. The other Rebels the while without stroke stricken, humbled themselves to their Sovereignes mercy, and found it in undeserved measure. Other strong troupes of horse are at the same instant dispatched to S. Catherine Mount in Cornwall, where the beautiful Lady Katherine Gordon had been left by her lewde husband. Her without resistance they brought safely to the King, whose beauty the whole Court praised, and pitied; but the King most graciously comforting her, sent her away well attended to the Queene his wife, and for her birthes sake allowed her maintenance, which in honourable manner supported her during the Kings life & many yeeres after. Her faireness was such, and her presence so amiable, that shee desired to be commonly cal-worthy either of her birth, her singular modicall, or wisely faith, notwithstanding the so abject condition of her husband) as they moved iust commi-seration toward her, so they doubled the lustre of her graces.

(52) In the meane while the King makes a reioicefull entrance into Exeter, to relieve his princely loue to the Citizens, whom he highly commended and graced, both for their courage and loyalty; commanding some of the Cornish Rebels to be executed there, which did the better set-off the others contrary condition. There also hee gave directions, to offer life, and obliuion of all crimes to Perkins, if he would voluntarily quie the Sanctuary and submit himselfe. Perkins being now without hope, without aide, without estate, most gladly came forth, and did put himselfe into the Kings hands. Rascals leading that wile Prince to extend this fauour, were drawne out of the depth of true iudgement, cleared from vulgar perturbations: firstly, it was not altogether impossible, but that Perkins might escape him, (though by offering selfe-violence) and so the world should seeke the light of satisfaction in so profound and perhaps a matchlesse impotence; then againe his youth might merite some compassion; but the infinite desire which Henry had, from the mouth of the party himselfe, to learne all the secrets of the plot, and who they were that lay undiscovered, and yet had finger in the mystical practise, moued him to affect the possession of his perill alone, which now hee had. Thus was this so dreaded a blaze of rebellion suddainly and finally quenched; but not without the teares of many in Drum and Sundersfire, whose estates the Kings officers seized and drained, in reuenge of their partaking, and supporting the Cornish Rebels, either in the field, or flight. Henry hauing Perkins in his power, gave way to all such scornes and scoffes, which his Courtiers or others were pleased to passe vpon him, the more to make his perion contemptible, who weill watched followed the King to London, whither as he progressed, multitudes flockt about to behold the Cai-tiffe, "who being a stranger gone any way (whatsoever hee thought to the contrary) descended of Nobles, had dared in trouble to great a Kingdome, and by his crafty conni-uences had induced so many Princes and Nations (not without mischief and ruine vnto diuers) to beleue of him, that which hee neuer was. And that he might in no part bee vnknewnt, hee is leasurly conieured on horsebacke from the farthest part of London, through Cheshide and Cornhill to the Tower, & backe from thence through Canwick-streets to Westminster, in the society of wonderment, and of all reproach and infamies. The King hauing in this sort taken reuenge of his so strange an enemy, and by curious and often examination comming to the full knowledge of that his soule desired, did see such to attend, as neuer went an inch from Perkins sight, (though hee seemed to goe at liberty) left through the slipperie Arts of his tempting speech and behaviour, hee might vanish into fainthearts, and raise fresh troubles in England, & bring new comfort to the Lady Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundie, the sinfull con-comence of all this cursed Scragame, whose heart was now almost tinen in funder with the newes of her Perkins most hideous shame and misery, the whole blushing tenor whereof might easily come to her handes at once; for Henry caused so much of the principall matter, as Perkins had confessed, to bee committed to the Printing Presse, (an Art then first appearing among vs, and published. None can iustly wonder, that wee haue dwelt so long in this won-derfull storie, but rather perhaps with that more particularities (though with more prolixity) had been vied. And though some other Actions as * Schysm Cabots discovery, and ouertures of marriages with Spain and Scotland, came betwene this apprehension, & the execution of Perkins, yet haue we thought it best, (the looser & at once to rid our handes of a * knave, as K. Henry iustly called him) to touch all that which concerns him, here together, not fearing to incur among the learned, the taxation of committing therein contradiction, and confusion of times.

(53) Perkins being thus guarded, could not withstanding attempt to escape. And, if it were lawfull to inferre particular coniectures, drawn out of the considerations of circumstances, we should perhaps not spare to say, that his attempt for escape, was not without the Kings priuacy; vizing such instruments to persuade, or furnish his flight, as might withall betray him, that so by degrees (occasion taken to cutte him off) the Realme might bee ridde from such perpetuall matter of trouble. For the depraued wile and will of man might find or faine reason to abuse the world still, if Perkins were at liberty; as that the confessions were extorted by force, or forged by Henry to ferre his turme, and the like. Therfore Perkins intention and escape (for hee was escaped) being discouered to the King, all this wayes were beleue, and hee so close pursued, that in the end betaking himselfe to a religious house of Carthousian Monkes, hee declared what hee was, and besought their Prior in the humblest manner he could, for Gods sake to keepe his life, which at the Priors suite was granted; but the Kings wrath being kindled, or the passage of his suppressed wrath opened thereby, hee banished all former respects, commanding him to be fettered, and set (for an whole day) in a paire of Stockes, mounted on a Scaffold before the Gate of Westminster Hall, and the next day to be alike expoled in Golden Chape, to the benefit of all contempt and scorn, so fettered, stockt, & scaffolded as before, to the great wonderment (saith Stow) of many, as either insinuating that all were not persuaded of the imposture, or that it seemed strange that one lately of so great Prowesse, should vndergoe so despicable a punishment. But for a scale and total summe of all ignominy and shame (such as no face did euer beare greater) he read his owne confession, written with his owne hand * as followeth.

(54) It is first to be knowing, that I was borne in the Towne of Turney in Flanders, and my fathers name is Iohn Osbecke, which said Iohn Osbecke was controller of the said Towne of Turney, and my mothers name is Katherin de Fore. And one of my Grandfathers vpon my fathers side was named Dorick Osbecke which died. After whose death my grandmother was married vnto Peter Fleming, that was receiver of the forenamed Towne of Turney, & Dean of the Botemere, that row vpon the water, or river called Le Seheld. And my Grandfater vpon my mothers side was Peter de Fore, which had in his keeping the keyes of the gate of Saint Iohn within the same Towne of Turney. Also I had an vnckle called M. Iohn Stalen, dwelling in the Parish of S. Paul, within the same Towne, which had married my fathers sister, whose name was Iane de Iane, with whom I dwelt a certaine season.

(55) And after I was led by my mother to Amwerp to learne Flemish, in a house of a cofin of mine, an officer of the said town, called Iohn Stunbeke, with whom I was the space of halfe a yeere, and after that I returned againe to Turney, by reason of warres that were in Flanders: and within a yeere following, I was first with a Merchant of the said Towne of Turney named Berle, to the Mart of Amwerp, where I fell sicke, which sicknesse continued vpon mee nine moneths. And the said Berle let mee to boord in a Skinners house, that dwelled beside the house of the English Nation. And by him I was from thence carried to Bruis Mart, and I lodged in the signe of the old man, where I abode for the space of two moneths.

(56) After this, the said Berle let mee with a Merchant of Antwerp to seaferre, for to learne the language, whose name was Iohn Streu, with whom I dwelt from Christmas to Easter, and then I went into Portingall in company of Sir Edward Brampton wife, in a shippes was called the Queenes shippe. And when I was come thither, then was I put in seruice to a Knight that dwelled in Lisborne, which was called Peter Pares de Coyne, with whom I dwelled an whole yeere, which said Knight had but one eye. And because I desired to see other countries, I tooke licence of him, and then I put my selfe in seruice with a Britaine, called Pregent Iken, which brought mee with him into Ireland. Now when we were there arrived in the town of Corke, they of the Towne (because I was arrayed with some clothes of silke of my said Masters) came vnto mee, and threatened vpon mee, that I should bee the Duke of Clarence Inne, that was before time at Dublin.

(57) But forasmuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto mee the holy Euangelists, and the Crocife, by the Maior of the town, which was called Iohn Lavelin, and therein the presence of him and others, I tooke mine oath (as the truth was) that I was not the foresaid Dukes sonne, nor none of his blood. And after this came vnto mee an Englishman, whose name was Stephen Patre, and one Iohn Water, and laud to me in swearing great oathes, that they knew well that I was King Richards bastard sonne; to whom I answered with like oathes, that I was not. Then they aduised me not to be afeard, but that I should take it vpon me holdly, and if I would so doe, they would aide and assist me with all their power against the King of England, and not onely they, but they were well assured, that the Earle of Desmond and Kildare should doe the same.

(58) For they forced not what part they tooke, so that they might bee reuenged on the King of England: and so against my will made mee to learne English, and taught mee what I should doe and say: And after this they called me Duke of Torke, second sonne to King Edward the fourth, because King Richards bastard sonne was in the hands of the King of England. And vpon this the said Water, Stephen Patre, Iohn Tiler, Hughbert Burgh, with many others, as the foresaid Earles, carried into this false quarrell, and within short time others. The French King sent an Ambassidor into Ireland, whose name was Lett Lucas, and M. Stephen Fribois, to aduertise me to come into France: and thence I went into France, and from thence into Flanders, and from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and so into England.

(59) From hauing thus bene made a publike spectacle, till all eyes were wearied with the view, and imaginations tired with thinking: hee continued to the Tower of London: where it had bene happy, if hee had onely wrought his owne destruction; but the bloody fate (so to speake of his disastrous birth) would not suffer him to perish single. In the same Tower was prisoner Edward the young Earle of Warwick, hauing lo bene from the first yeare of Henry to this present, for no fault of his, but for the neere Tiler to the Crowne, hee carried person inseparable master of danger &c.

Of his simplicity, by reason of his education in prison from his infancy, there is a report, that as one who liued out of the view of the world, hee knew not an * heane from a goole, or one fowle or Creature from another. To hasten the ruine of so innocent a danger, he beheld there brekes forth a counterfeit Earle of Warwick, as if all that which the world saw horrible in Perkins darings, had been but a document to instruct others in the like, and that nothing were to be feared therein, but want only of success, which who so euer could propound to himselfe all things else, were full of encouragement and reason. This counterfeit was a * Cordwainers son of London, aged about twenty yeeres, and called * Ralph Willford, who for falsely assuming the name & title of the said Earle, being thereunto taught, and suborned, a practise which well declared that the malicious Dutchesse of Burgundie did still liue) was hanged at S. Thomas Waterings by Southwarke vpon Shrovetide day.

(60) This new deuise to vncrowne King Henry, so wakened his owne feares, and the eies of the Catholicks, (who had secretly agreed to marry their Princess Katherine to our Prince Arthur) that there seemed no sure ground of succession, if that the Earle of Warwick were not made ayay. A fearefull case, where the false reason of State shall faile to it selfe an impossibility of well doing, without shedding innocent blood, and shall therefore resolute to found vpon so crying a sinne, the hope of perpetuity in succession; sith nothing is truer, then that sinne was not an vnseure basis to sith lasting works vpon. But o the narrow capacities of the most seeing men; the confidence whereof did vndoubtedly lead this King (herein not iustifiable, howsoever excusable in respect of humane frailty, which might propound to it selfe many feares, and respects both publike and priuate) to connise at the plotted death, or rather formal murder of this harmlesse Gentleman, whose wrong may yet moue the hardest to compassion, as it afterwarde stirred God in iustice to reuenge, prospering no part of that great worke which was thereupon thus corruptly fought to be perpetuated. That noble Lady Katherine herselfe was heretof so miserable, that when the diuorce was afterward prosecuted against her by King Henry the eighth, her second husband, shee is reported to haue said, That it was the hand of God,

The true Earle of Warwick de-

for that to cleere the way to her marriage that innocent Earle of Warwick was put to unworthy death. Neither let licentious Practises vouch the singular Act of Salomon in taking away the life of his elder brother Adonias to colour this homicide: for he that will argue from particular facts in Scripture, shall not onely leave no Adonias living, but perhaps no Salomon. To worke this young Warwick roine, the milchieinos and dumfall wretch Perkin becomes an occasion, if not an instrument, for he by his supple insinuations and blowing promises had corrupted his keepers, the servants of Sir Iohn Digbie Knight Lieutenant of the Tower; who (as * was affirmed) meant to haue murdered their maister, and then to haue set Perkin, and the Earle at large, to which practise of escape the poore Earle is said to haue consented. Perkin for this conspiracie had his trial at Wylmington, and hee together with one Iohn d'Waters, who had beene sometime Maior of Corke in Ireland, were condemned, and being drawne to Ti-burne, had the sentence of death executed vpon them. Perkin at the Gallows did reade his former confession, taking on his death that the same was true, and vnder-went his punishment with patience. Walter Bletet, and Thomas Aswood (being two of the conspirators, for the other two Strangewaters and Long Rogers, being the Lieutenants men also, were not executed, nor for so much as we haue read, arraigned) not long after receiued the reward of their offence at the same place.

(61) Iustice thus took hold at last of Perkin Warbeck, on whom the Proverbe which faith, that Pride is the Sister of Shame, was worthily verified. Neither could the world accuse King Henric for his death, vnlesse it were, for that he had not hanged him sooner, but suffered him to liue till hee had drawne after him a greater ruine in Warwick person, then in all the former tragedies. For this Earle being a chiefe Prince of the blood, and next heire Male of his hoole to the Crowne of England, (a crime of which his birth onely made him guilty and not any fact of his) being thus charged to haue giuen assent to Perkins plot of escape, he was publickly arraigned before the Earle of Oxford (then High Steward of England) by the name of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwick, and indicted for wilfully to haue escaped (as they said) out of the Tower, and consequently according to the dreadful licence of inferences among our *Englis*h pleadres in cases of death) to deprive King Henric of his royall Crowne and dignity, and to vspurie the Title and soueraigne office, prosecuting their bloody Poetry with the like sanguinary syllogismes, though vicerly without measure, or fashion. The Earle doubly betrayed, first by the letters of the inane, and then by their filly or deceitfull persuasions who were put about him, confessed the endiement, and submitteth himselfe to the Kings mercie; that is, offered vp his head to bea suppettie foudation of King Henrics farther pot-poles; for sentence of death was thereupon pronounced as against a Traitor. This one practise seemes sufficient, if not to call vpon Henry the Title of a heretic and perilous man, yet to raise a doubt, whether (* as one writes) hee was more sincere and entire then Ferdinando King of Spaine, upon whom (saith that Author) he did himselfe bestow the ename of the death of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwick.

The life therefore of this Prince (according to rigour of lawe) being thus in his power, the King gently pardoned all the paines, but the losse of his head, which was cut off vpon a scaffold at Tower-hill, and then (another grations fauour) his body was not buried in the Chappel of the Tower, or in any other common place, but at Rygham by his Ancestors. Jealous (saith * one) the King was ouer the greatness of his Nobilitie, as remembering how himselfe was set vp; and much more did this humour encrease in him after he had conflicted with such Idols and Conterfets as Lambert Simond and Perkin Warbeck. The stranges of which dangers made him thinke nothing life. This Earle was the last heire male of the blood and furname of Plantagenet; whose race as it was a long time glorious for giuing Kings to England, (euen from King Henry the second) so in the end (chiefly for the house of Turke) it became hateful (as it seemes) to God and man, for the most horrible and inextinguible deadly feudes, murder, perjuries, and other horrors committed within it selfe, which (as then not fully expiated) lay heauiely vpon the head of this Earle, and finally threw open all those fences, which the possession of Maitle and numerousitie of issue had for sundry ages kept about it, letting in thereby the surname of Tudor being but two defectes *Englis*h, and which now after three defectes and five Princes is also vanished. Now, among those few great workes of peace which ensued their firebrands of warre, we must remember the marriage of Prince Arthur, with the Princess of Spaine Lady Katherine. The interion from Warwick death till then, brought forth a verie great plague, whereof in London there are said to haue died about thirtie thousand. The King and Queene remove to Calais in May and returned in June. The maine * busines was to reuiue and ratifie the state of famiely, and negociations, betwene the *Englis*h and the Duke of Burgundies sobasies. Shine also was born, and being new builded, called Richmond, for which and the like, it will be fittest to haue recourse to vulgar Annals.

(62.) The Coast of Scate now seeming cleare from all thickening weather, Ferdinando and Isabelle King & Queene of Spaine, according to the points of agreement betwene them and King Henry, concerning their fourth daughter the Lady Katherine (borne at Alcala de Finari or Complutum) sent her royally appointed in a goodly Fleet to England, there to fulfill in person, what hitherto had beene onely treated of, who after many difficulties took land at * Plymouth in October. Ferdinando her father was the sonne of Iohn King of Arragon and Stieffe, and although he was vnlawne, as being brought vp among armes and soldiours, yet by vsing the familiarity of wilsones he also became very wise and proued that great Prince which first in these latter times recalled the old glorie of Spain, and reared it to such an enuious magnitude, as that the iealousie thereof hath bred no small quarrels in Christendome. For by his marriage with Isabelle, (sole sister and heire to Henry the fourth King of Castile and Leon.) he reigned in right of his wife, and ioiuly with her, ouer those two Kingdomes and their appertanences, who together (saith * Mercurius of Sicilia) did admirable things and workes most holy. They * recovered the hope Cay and Kingdoms of Granada, and part of Andalusia from the Moores, after they had bene in violent possession thereof tenen hundredth and fourescore yeeres, and hazing purged those places from the filth of Mahometes superstitions, built Churches to the honour of Iesus Christ, by occasion whereof Ferdinando was furnamed the Catholike King. The wailles of the Clute of Granada at the time of the surrender, which (after about tenne yeeres warres) was by Ferdinando King thereof made to Ferdinando and Isabelle half * twelve miles in compass, and in the tame twelve Gates, and a thousand towres enclosing seven Hillies coured with building, innumerable people, and inestimable riches, & the Spanish forces at this conquest were about 12000. Horse, & one hundred thousand foot. The said King and Queene, besides many other their mighty actions, did also first discover America, by Christopher Columbus, & thereby brought a whole new world to the notice of Christendome. Isabelle her selfe, defended of the blood roial of England, being daughter of Iohn the second King of Castile & Leon, son of Henric the third King of Castile and Leon, and of Katherine his wife (daughter of * Iohn Duke of Lancaster, third sonne of our Edward the third of triumphall and neuer-dying memorie) was a Lan- die, whole * like the Christian world had seldom any of that wildome, grauity, chastity, and of so laborious a deuotion, that * he did not onely day by day performe the Canonical and lawfull tasks of prayers vnto by Priests, but many other, and brought vp her children accordingly.

(63) The Lady Katherine being about eightene yeeres old, and borne of so great, so noble, so victorious and vertuous parents, is with iustitiously and solemnity openly married in Paules Church to Arthur Prince of Wales, aged about fifteene yeeres, and eldest sonne to Henry the seventh, King of England, and of Elizabeth his wife. The Archbishop of Canterbury assisted with nineteene Bishops and Abbots, mixed, ioyning their hands, and performed all the other Church rites vpon that great day. The vulgar Annals can tell you the splendor and glorie thereof, in apparrell, iewels, Pageants, banquets, gifts, and other princely complements, the onely weighty booke of many weaker braines. A grace Lady (as for haue written) was laid in bed between the Bride and Bridegrome, to hinder actual consummation, in regard of the Princes greene estate of body; but others alledge many arguments to prooue that matrimonial performance was between them, howeouer her self, (when that afterward came in question) * appealed to the conscience of K. Henry the eighth (her second husband) if hee found her not a maide. But Prince Arthur enioyed his marriage a very thort while, for in Aprill following hee died at Ludlow, being vnder fixteene yeeres of age: being a Prince, in whose youth the lights of all noble vertues did cleerly beginne to shine. His aptnesse to lears was almost incredible, for (by the report of his * Master) hee had either learned without booke, or otherwise studiously turned and reuolued with his own hands & eyes these authors following. In Grammar, Germ, Perot, Salpizius, Gellius and Pallas: In Poetic, Horace, Virgil, Lucret, Ouid, Silue, Plautus, and Terence: In Oratorie: Tullius Offit, Epistiles, Paradoxes and Quintilian. In Histories, Thucydides, Lince, Caesars Commentaries, Suetonius, Tacitus, Plinius, Valerius Maximus, Sallust, Enchirion. Wherein were haue bene particular, to signifye what Authors were then thought fite to bee elementary and rudimentall vnto Princes; and by their example, so all of Noble or gentle birth, whole so periciall boldnes in booke in these frothy dayes, is become most scandalous and inturious to the honour, and vie of learning.

(64) But before the vnicely expiration of this great hope of England, King Henry weary of warres and tumults, and desirous to lay the beginnings of a long peace by most inward friendship with all his great neighbours, had concluded a match between Margaret his eldest daughter, and James the fourth King of Scotland, the * alliance whereof was published in the February next before Prince Arthurs death at Paules Crosse: in reioycement whereof, * Te Deum was sung, and other figures of publike ioy declared. The * Bishoppe of Basse said, that the Earle of Bathwell did openly bandfast, or espouse the said faire Lady, in the name of King James at Paules Crosse, being Saint Pauls day. This contract was brought about in manner following. After that the flame of warthead (by mediation as before said) became thoroughly laid between the two sister Nations, it chanced certaine of the Scots by their suspicious behauiour, and rough Phraesto prouoke the Garrison of Norham Castle to issue, who in the bickering slew and hurt some of them, and droue the rest away. King * James expostulates this violence very sharply by letters with King Henry, who returned most iustitiously answers. Richard Fox Bishop of Durham (whose the men and Caillwell) wrote also many deprecatory letters, humbly praying the Scottish King to accept amends, whereunto hee in the end inclined, and having some matters of farre greater moment to impart, desired the Bishops presence in Scotland, knowing his deepe wildome and great grace with his Soueraigne, which King Henry gladly assented vnto. The meeting was at Mebeffe, an Abbey of Cisterrian Monkes, wherethe King abode, who hauing roundly vetered to the Bishoppe his offence conceiaed for the breach of good termes at Norham Castle, and yet being finally pleased to receive satisfaction, hee then secretly disclosed his whole mind, the summe whereof was, That the king of England would be pleased to give to him in marriage the Lady Margaret his eldest daughter, as a pledge of indissoluble amitie. The Bishoppe promised his best diligence, and accordingly after his returne, laboured therewith with King Henry, who most gladly hearkened thereunto. Whereupon the Scottish King sent the Archbishoppe of Glasgow, the Earle of Bathwell, and others to demand the Lady in marriage. Their entertainment was hearty and princely. But when the proposition came to scanning at the Councell table, it had not current passage at first: for there were who objected as an inconueniency, That by this marriage the Crowne of England might come to the Scottish line, by the issue of Lady Margaret. Whereunto it is said, King Henry made this answer: What if it should? for if any such thing should happen, which Owen God forbid, I see it will come to passe, that our Kingdome shall lose nothing thereby, because there will not be an accession of England to Scotland, but contrariwise of Scotland to England, as to that which is farre above the most noble head of the whole Island, seeing that which is lesse usefulh is accesse to the ornament and honour of that which is much the greater, as Normandy heretofore came to be under the dominion and power of the English our forefathers. When this was said, the whole boord of counsell received it as an Oracle, & it went cleare about, That Margaret should be married to the King of Scotland. With this answer and other instructions the Scottish Ambassadors were sent home, who afterward returned into England with full authority & satisfaction to all Henrys propositions, whereupon ensued the before said publication of assurances at Paules Crosse. It was a principall Article in this agreement: That no Englishman should enter Scotland, nor Scot into England without commendatory letters from their Soueraigne. Which Article was reputed a speciall meane to preserve the peace inuoluble.

(65) But ere the young Lady her self was conuozed into Scotland, her brother Prince Arthur died, and in * February next ensuing, their mother also Queene Elizabeth, as there lay in Child-bed within the Tower of London. The King to repaire his mind with fresh consolations, in aduancing his onely remaining sonne, Henry Duke of York, created him suddainly Prince of Wales, Earle of Chester & Plantagenet within few dayes after his mothers decaile. Thus was Arthurs losse supplied, howeouer Henry made Prince, espoused loone after * (though with much relictation) the Lady Katherine his elder brothers widow, a vpon the five and twentieth of June, as the Bishoppe of Salisbury house in Fleetstreet. And in this wise, by providing so worthy a wife for him, (though to say truth, her great Dower was the chiefe mooue) the king thought, that the estate of England was sufficiently settled, wherefore conuerting his cares to the accomplishment of affinity with Scotland, hee most suspiciously furnished his dearest eldest daughter for her journey, & himself in person travelled thro Richmond as farre with her as Cherlesford betwixt Norhampton, where his mother the Countesse lay: after certaine dayes spent in solace, the King gaue her his blessing, with fatherly counsell and exhortation, and committed the guard and conduct of her person principally to the Earles of Surrey and Norhamberland, and to such Ladies and Gentlewomen as were appointed to that seruice: a great company of Lords, Knights, Esquires, & men of Marke attending them as farre as Berwick, At *S. principall of his Nobles, received her from the hands of the Earle of Northumberland, and the next yeere after, married her at Edinborough, in the presence of all his Nobility. The King gave great entertainment to the English, and shewed them insisting and other pastimes after the Scottish fashion. The Scottishmen (such as the Bishoppe of Ross) were not behind, but farr above the Englishmen, both in apparrell, rich Jewels, and maslie chaines, many Ladies having their habiliments set with Goldsmith worke, garnish'd with Pearle and Stone of price, with gallant and well trapped horses. Divers Ladies also and young Gentlemen of England, attending Queene Margaret, remained there, and were well married to certaine Noblemen of Scotland, whose progenie lives honourably there even at these dayes. The effect of this marriage is gravely described by the same Bishop in these words. There was perfect peace and sincere amity betwene the two Realmes of England and Scotland a long time after. And worthily, during the life of King Henry the seventh, no cause of breach was manifested by either of the Princes, but they continued in great love and friendship, and mutually sweeten'd contracting of marriages, continuall interchange of Merchandize betwene the Subjects of both the Realmes, as they had beene AL under the obedience of ONE PRINCE; where through, Justice, Policy and Riches did flourish, and abound throughout the whole Isle of Albion. And of this marriage is James the sixth descended, being that ONE PRINCE under whose obedience AL are now govern'd, as under the sole and lawfull lineall Monarch of great Brittain: for this James the fourth had Issue James the fifth, hee had Issue Queene Mary, shee had Issue our present Soueraigne, the great grandchild of the said Queene Margaret eldest daughter of K. Henrie the seventh.

(66) Which effects of peace and riches, as they could not but be comfortable to so wife a King as Henry, they being the fruit as it were of his owne iust labours; so let vs now observe the last worldly cares of his raigne, and vpon what objects hee fixed his mind, freed from the awe of open challenges of the Crowne, and from throwes at his maine, which with what art, valour and felicity, hee at first achiev'd, and with how great hazards, troubles, and bloudie businesse, he brought it to such passe, that neighbour Kinges required it safe to entermarry with his family, wee have already heard: Two principall points tooke up the last Scenes of his life, for the rest of his time hee wholly employed, either in the service of Almighty God (wherein hee was so diligent that every day hee was present, after the deuotions of those times, at two or three Masses, oftentimes hearing godly Sermons, yet in building, wherewith hee kept his senses buled. The one of the two chiefe points, was to watch over the waies of his wives kindred (the remaining branches of the turbulent and unfortunate house of Turke) whose growth and greatness hee supposed might at some time or other overtoppe his owne; the other was, vnder opinion of iustice, to encrease his treasure out of the common puries, whereby hee seemed oncruous to many, & so much obscured the brightness of his former glory, at leastwise diminished his opinion with the generality. Concerning his counsell holden with his wives kindred, (the laterall issues and faddles of the Plantagenets) it fell out thus; which (by occasion of the accidental landing of Philip King of Spaw at this time, whereby the Earle of Suffolke taking was procured) we thought it best to handle here together. Edmond de la Pale Earle of Suffolke (Sonne to John Duke of Suffolke, and of Elizabeth sister to King Edward the fourth) in the sixteenth yeere of King Henrie raigne, wilfully slew a common person in his furie. Henry not sorry to have occasion of encreasing his popularity, by presenting to great a person to exemplary iustice, and in the same act to blemish the honour of a man, whose quality was to him suspected, caused him for the same to be arraigned. The fact hee was perswaded to confesse, and therupon had pardon. The Earle neuertheless, as a Prince of the blood, holding himselfe disgraced, by having beene seen a Prisoner at the Kings Bench Barre, fled the land discontented, and went to his Aunt the Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundie; but within a while after, being fairly reconciled, hee returned. After which, notwithstanding, whether it were by reason of debet (the certaine attendant of vaine-spirited and base-brained Courtiers) wherinto he had deeply thrown himself for his furniture, at the celebration of his cosen Prince Arthurs marriage, or for that the restless spirit of ennie in the Dutchesse had preailed, hee taking his brother with him, fledde againe the next yeere after. The King who had pardoned his life, seemed now to repent his clemency, though it is plaine, hee spared him of purpose, till hee might discover more of a conspiracy which hee knew was in hammering; but his flight troubled him not a little, knowing the violent humor of that Lord, and remembering to what a dangerous & bloudy issue his brother the Earle of Lennox had once already brought things at the hattell of Sabrin in the beginning of his raigne.

(67) For remedy, hee betakes himselfe to his wonted arts, and therefore to learne the secrets of the enemy, Sir Robert Curson Knight (Capitaine of the Castell of Hamour by Calais) takes himselfe a friend to the Earle, and flies from his charge unto him. An office unworthy of Knighthood; neither can any good spirit in the world stoop it selfe to such double faced employment, which besides the treacherous dissimulations thereof, cannot but bee accompanied with wilfull impieties. For who is admitted to trust vpon a contrary side, without invocations of Gods holy name, protestations, adurations, oathes, the utmost assurances which man can give to man, to beget a convenient assistance in his sincerity? but by this stratagem the king rankles the bolomes and cabinets of his adversaries, discovering their designs and hopes. Whereupon, William Courtney Earle of Devonshire (being most nobly descended, and having to his wife the Lady Katherine, one of the daughters of K. Edward the fourth, and sister to Queene Elizabeth wife of King Henry) William de la Pale brother to the said Edmond Earle of Suffolke, Sir James Tyrrel, Sir John Widdowall Knights, who other, were attached, and committed to custodie, and afterward also George Nene Lord Abegny, and Sir Thomas Greene Knight, were likewise apprehended, but were soon delivred. The Earle of Devonshire, though innocent (for it is the misery of such great men, that their owne innocency cannot always procure their owne safety) but their birth-right many times, and often other mens designations without their least priuie, is enough to hazard them, yet it is in the power of any conspirator by bare nomination, to doe as much, so that it concerns them to haue an eye not to their owne safety, but to the betterance also of their whole Alliances and dependencies) this Earle (I say) though innocent, remained Prisoner during this Kings life, and some yeeres of his sonnes raigne, who set him at liberty. The other, William the Earle of Suffolkes brother, had not so strict hand holden over him. But Sir James Tyrrel, Lieutenant of Guines Castell, and Sir John Widdowall, Widdowall, servant to Sir James Tyrrel, Curson Pursuivant, Matthew Jones yeoman, and a Shipman were condemn'd of treason for aiding the Earle of Suffolke. The two Knights were beheaded at Towerhill. The Shipman quartered at Tyburne. Curson and Jones suffered death at Guines.

(68) This so round and quick dealing with the Earles complices and fauourers, startled his Gallow and raw inuentions, and made their whole bolke to swarve and splinter; but the King rested not so; for vpon the Sunday before the feast of St. Simeon and

1 mile, in the same yeere, of the said executions, there was published at Pauls Crosse, by the Kings proceement from Pope Alexander the sixth, a Bull of * Excommunication and curse against the said Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Curlew, and five other persons by speciall name, and generally all other which aided the Earle against the King to the disturbance of the Kingdome. Thus did the most prudent Henrie pursue his enemies, not onely with secret countermines and open weapons of Law, before they could assemble to make any shew, but also with spirituall lightning; which doubtlesse, had they beene vpon iust cause, and by lawfull authoritie fulminated, ought infinitely to be dreaded of good Christians, because (as Saint Paul saith) they deliver over to Satan. Sir Robert Curlew was named, of purpose, to make the Earle secure of him; which may well be called a perillous, if not a prophane deuile, though his Holinesse were made the instrument thereof. Neither did the King leave here, for by his letters and messengers he so prevailed with Pope * Alexander, as hee decreed by his Bull, That no person should offer to a house privilege of Sanctuary, who had once taken the same, and come forth againe: and that, * of any Sanctuary-man should afterwards commit any murder, robbery, sacrilege, treason, or be should by law force be deuyne thence to suffer due punishment.

This was of great vie to the King, and preserved many subjects from precipitation, for the whole of Sanctuaries had beene an efficient of many troubles. But the same Pope (having sent John Gylst his Recorder, to gather money in England) shewed himselfe much more favourable to such as perpetrated those sad hainous offences, as also, * Vary, simony, rapines, adulteries, or whatsoever offences (excepting certaine offences against the Pope and Clergy, &c.) when he lent a * Bull of pardons (for money) to all such offenders in England; dispensing also thereby, with such, as kept away, or by any fraud had gotten the goods of other men, which they should now retaine still without scruple of conscience, so as they paid a ratable portion thereof, unto his Holinesse Recorders. Sir Robert Curlew (though before awarded by the Pope) retournes, when he saw fit time, into England, and withall into wonted fauour with his Soueraigne. The Earle, seeing himselfe thus dript of all hope to doe much harme, wandred about Germany and France to finde repose, but in the end quite tyred, he put himselfe into the grace and protection of Philip then in Flanders who by the death of Isabelle was King of Spaine, in right of Iean his wife, eldest daughter of Ferdinand and Isabelle; where he remained in banishment, till King Philip was driven by tempest in the moneth of January into England, as hee meant to have passed through the Straits, or English Ocean, into Spaine, there to take possession of that Kingdome and other the appurtenances.

(70) The chiefe Ship of the Nauie Reiall, where in the King was, and two other (all the rest being scattered by the fury of the weather into several places and other Ports of England) thrust into Harbour at * Folkestone. Himselfe weary and sicke with the violent tossings of the Sea (whereunto hee had neuer as it seemes, bene viced,) would needes come on shore, and refresh his spirits, though the principal men about him dissuaded that course, as foreseeing it would procure a longer stay, then the nature of their occasions would perhaps well heare. And so indeed it selout, for being now in another Princes (though his friends) dominions, where hee had no power over himselfe, nor others, & the rumor of arruall stirring the men in authority thereabout, Sir Thomas Treuehard Knight with the luddé forces of the Countrey, not knowing what the matter might be, came thither, and vnderstanding the royall quality of the person, invited him with all humble humanity to his house, and forthwith dispatched postes to Court; not long after Sir Iohn Care Knight (with a great troupe of armed men) repaired also, pursuing the like humble entreaties; which the King, fearing constraint, because they were but subjects and durst not let him passe without their Lord and Masters leave necessarily yielded vnto. Vpon notice of this mightie Princes casuall arruall, King Henry presently commanded the Earle of Arundell to entertaine him till himselfe could come, who very magnificently did so, with * three hundred Horfes by Torch-light; and in the meane while King Henry himselfe prepares. Philip perceiving, that whatsoever speed his affaires required, yet now there was no remedy but to stay, thought not good to expect his approach, but to prevent it, and came vpon the spurte to Windsor, that he might be gone againe the sooner, after whom Queene Iean his wife came lea-farely. The rest of this entertainment, because it hath matter of weight, and is well set downe by Polydore Vrygal, it shall suffice vs to follow his footsteps. At Windsor, the two Kings, after long and scurrill discourses, beganne to conferre about renewing their league. Henry required that Edmund Earle of Suffolke might be delivered up into his power, which Philip denied to be a thing that hee could doe, as holding it most vnreasonable to be the author of his death, whom hee had taken into Protection: but when at the last he found, that no excole nor teaton, could satisfie, for that, Henrie voluntarily offered to sue the Earles life, he promised to doe therein what hee desired, and presently took order for his sending over. According whereunto, King Henry (to draw out the time, till hee had the wished prey) couised King Philip to London, to shew him the head City of his Kingdome, out of which after a little stay hee recondued him. The Earle in the meane time, who concieued horror at the first newes of King Philips landing in England, as fatall to him, and resolved that no hope was longer to be reposed in the faith of forraigne Princes, came over not willingly, presuming that after padon of life, hee might also in time regaine his liberty; or if that hope failed, yet should be at leestwise obtaine to die, and be buried in his Country. But King Philip and his Queene, hauing feasted with her sister the Princess of Wales, departed England. The Earle was brought through Flanders to Calles vpon the sixteenth of March, and landed at Dover vpon the foure and twentieth of the same, conueighed thither by Sir Henrie West, and Sir Iohn Wylfare, with threecore men in armour of the Garrison of Calles; and at Dover Sir Iohn Laurl and others receiving him, guarded him safe to the Tower of London. King Philip, not long after his landing in Spaine deceased, being not thirtie yeeres old. This tempest which drane him into England was holden by the people as prodigious, for it blew down the golden Eagle from the famous Spire of Pauls Steeple (being of Copper richly ouergilt, of fourey pounds weight, in length foure foote, and in breadth three,) which also in the fall thereof, brake and battered the signe of the Blacke Eagle, in Pauls Church-yard, in the place where now the School-busse stands. This accident euen then made some coniecture, that the Emperor Maximilian (whose Imperiall Ensigne the Eagle is) should suffer some ill accordingly (saith Polydore) as indeed hee did by the death of King Philippe his sonne. Which (if any superliciously delight in Calculations of that blind nature) we may well parallel with that * lightning which stroke the letter C out of Caesar in the inscription of Caesar Augustus his statue; whereupon it was gathered, that Augustus should liue but one hundred daies after, and then bee called a God, (as for the remaining syllables so signifying in the old Hebrew tongue,) which accordingly hapned.

(69) Thus was the Earle of Suffolke brought backe, and the King anchored his quiet at the safe custody of his person within the Tower. The other wordly point wherein he chiefly bestowed his ages care, was to gather money, though by courtes seem- ing very grieuous and full of hiterneffe; the too gripping greedinesse, and too profuse launtyesse of money in Princes, being both alike offensive to a well fed estate. Some excuse his doings herein (amongst whom Polydor is chiefe) as not proceeding from any depravation or vncorrected affection of his nature, but from an opinion and forecast of generall profite: because a Princes humor of gathering, tendeth, though with distrust of particular men, to the good publike, whereas his profusenes, though with some particular mens profite, endeth in the empoverishment of the whole. And Henry himselfe protested (saith Polydor) hee did it not for love of money, but with a purpose to bridle the fierce minds of a nation bred up among factions: though they (saith the same author) who felt the smart, and were wounded by his Instruments,* cried out they were not so much the darts of severity, which did hit them, as of avarice. Yet Polydors Apologie may be current: for it is not to be doubted, but that such vice the King might propound himselfe; and yet withall, we can hardly find any commendable root thereof, the wayes being so impotent and harsh, by which beiraied money. Let vs heerein this point the obsequiue * Knight. Of nature (saith hee) Henry coveted to accumulate treasure, which the people (into whom there is infused, for the preservation of Monarchies, a naturall desire to discharge their Princes, though it bee with the onely charge of their Counsellors and Ministers) did impute unto Cardinall Morton, and Sir Reynold Bray, who (as it afterward appeared) as Counsellors of ancient authority with him, did so second his humor, as nevertheless they tempered it. Where it is truly said, it afterward appeared: for till they were gone to account to God, and his feare for the maine quite banished, the king did not let loose the reins to his immoderate desire of hating, which yet was not more sinfull, then the meanes vnder him practised, were odious. For * Empton and Dudley that followed, being persons that had no reputation with him, otherwise then the servile following of his worse humors, gave him way, and shaped him meanes to their extremities, whereby himselfe was touched with remorse at his death, and which has since for disanured. And this we take to be a true judgement. To be particular in the recital of things worthy to die in forgetfulness, is not onely to reke, but in a sort to teach them also, as some, who by broad lectures, have as it were read a lecture of those vices, against which they have pretended to teach. But publike and shamefull Arts may more safely be delinere. The instruments whome the King set on worke (or who perhaps set the King on worke) were * two Lawyers, Richard Empton (afterward knighted) and Edmund Dudley Esquier, their employment was to cal the richer subiect into question for breach of old penall lawes, long before discontinued and forgotten, whereby they brake in vpon the people, as it were at vnaware, like a kind of authorized robbers, masked vnder the pretence of seruice for the King, and the names of Delators or Promoters, a * familiar sickness in the times of ancient Tyrannies. But the courses to execute their employment, were void of all conscience and colour. For one of them was to * outlaw persons secretly, and then to seize their estates, drating them to chargefull compositions with the King, and heauy bribes to the Authors of their trouble. More detestable was another practise of theirs. For there were false Monis and ring leaders of false Tutors, who would neuer give any reward against the will of their patrons, the said Empton and Dudley; so that if any durst stand out vpon triall, the destiny of their cause was squared forth by the leade rule of those fellowes consciences; which to be a truth, the expiatory punishment which K. Henry the eight tooke of them in the first yeare of his raigne, doth clearly conuince. By these meanes many honest and worthy subiects were rigorously fined, imprisoned, or otherwise afflicted, which filled the land with sorrow and reynings. Among very many others thus abused, Sir William Capell Alderman of London was eminent, as from whom, in the tenth yeare of the kings raigne, had bene seized, vnder the colour of much-anted and vntried Lamer, above sixteen hundred pounds sterling, and was now againe plaide at a freeth, and another hand drawne vpon him for two thousand pounds, which because he would not pay, hee was by Dudley commanded prisoner to the Tower; but by the death of the King which ensued, all such prisoners were released. If any perhaps will slight the hard vsage extended to Citizens, and to the like, they are wawile therein, neither thinke as Patriots ought. For though it may so fall out that the personall vexation of some few, merits no great pity; yet the example is plentiful; and it is a part of the cunning, to chooke out at first such for patternes, as vpon whole persons least compassion may fall, which examples may afterward bee extended to whomsoever. These reuels and rages against the wealthiest sort continued, till it pleased God to sting the Kings heart with rust compunction, toward the horror of his death; who had the fauour from heauen, as to lie sicke of a consuming disease, which waisted him by such insensible degrees, as gave him the use of his whole selfe (as it were) till the last gaspe, whereby hee had meane to recollect himselfe, after those many soule-wounding assaults which attend regall greedinesse, and to submit his thoughts to such ghostly admonishments (touching another life) whereunto in dayes of health, the hearts or cares of great Princes are seldom attentive.

(71) About the yeere of his death, being vnderstood that Lewis King of France, despairing of issue male, had annulled the Contracts made betwene Charles King of Spain (sonne of the late King Philip, and afterward elected Emperour by the name of Charles the fifth) and the Lady Claudia his eldest daughter, whom he newly betrothed to Francis of Palme Dolphin of France, and Duke of Angoulesme. King Henry (whose care for preservation of the common quiet, and good of his Country, by forrain alliances, was euer holy in him and awake) thought it a faire occasion for him to match his younger daughter the Lady Mary. The French King to haue the aduise of James the fourth King of Scots, in the bestowing the said Madam Claudia his eldest daughter, had before sent Bernard Stewart Lord Delegue, and the President of Toulous, Ambassadors for that purpose, who finally in effect receiued this answer: * That the said King James thought it best that his eldest daughter should be married within his owne Realme of France, for if she were married vpon any forraigne Prince, it might give colour to claime titles in the said Realme afterward. And if he did marrie her at home, rather to him the said Francis, whom he had appointed to succeed then any other. Which resolution was very acceptable to K. Lewis, because it lumped with his owne purpose, and it was followed accordingly. King Henry therefore hearing that King Charles might be obtained, so pursued the point * by the prudent managing of Recherd Fere (now Bishoppe of Winchester) his Ambassador, that King Charles his Ambassadors coming out of Flanders, where hee was educated, and meeting him at Calis, the affaire was opened, disputed, concluded, and the Lady Mary then about ten yeeres of age (as King Charles himselfe) was by solenne contract assured to him for wife.

(72) Now therefore his Sonne Humie Prince of Wales, being heire of the Crowne, and married to his eldest daughter, the Lady Margaret, Queene of Scotland; the Lady Mary his youngest, provided for so highly (though in the end it came to nothing) all likelihood of perill by competitors, or base Factionists, buried in the Tower, by the imprisonment of Edmund Earle of Suffolke; his people tractable and calme; his coffers full, and the state of things ripe for a succellour: death (the executioner of the Almightyes sentence,) was ready to discharge him of the prison of his flesh. Before he departed, "we'll despised persons rendering the health of his soule, did both in sermons, and otherwise, informe him of the excommuni-cations against sinners; Wherefore he of his blessed disposition granted to all men generall pardons, certaine only excepted. In his life time hee founded the goodly Hospitall of the Sauy, built fixe religious Houses for Franciscan Friars, three of them for observants, and the other three for Conventuals. Of his building also was Richmond Pallace, and that most beautifull peece, the Chappell at Westminster, the one the place of his death, and the other of his buriall: which formes of more curious and exquisite building, he and Bishoppes Fate, first (as is reported) learned in France, and thence brought with them into England. He died about the age of fiftie two yeeres, vpon the two and twentieth of "April having reigned twenty three yeeres and eight months. A right noble, wise, victorious and renowned King, and one whose peety would haue bene farre more eminent, then all his other ver-tues, if from the beginning the malignant quality of the times, would haue permitted him to live in quiet. He specially honoured the remembrance of that Saint-like Man, Henry the sixth, the founder of his Family, and Prophetical fore-teller of that fortune which now hee died felled off, whom also he laboured to haue "Canonized for a Saint, but that Pope Julius held that honour at too high a rate.

It is reckoned by some writers "of that age among his principall glories, that three Popes, Alexander the sixth, Pius the third, and Julius the second, did in their severall times, with authority and consuet of the Cardinals, elect and chose him for chiefe defender of Christs Church, before all other Christian Princes. In his last will and Testament, after the disposition of his soule and body, hee desired and willed Refutation should be made of all such monies, as had vnclesse bene leuied by his Officers. A most po-tious and truly Christian care, whereby also appeareth, that hee hoped the wrongs done vnder him were not so enormous nor innumerable, but that they might fall within the possibility of redresse. The description of his whole man, is had in the beginning of his life, and the course thereof described in his Actions. There remaine of his wisdom many effects, and those as his famelike to continue for euer.

long contending Families of Lancaster and Turke, and the Roses red and White joined into one, to the great ioy of the English Subjects. Shee was crown-

November, the third of her husbands Raigne, and of Grace 1487. Shee was his wife eighteene yeeres and twenty foure daies, and died in child-bed in the Tower of London, the eleventh of February, euen the day of her owne Nativity, the eighteenth of her husbands Raigne, and yeere of

(72) Arthur the eldest sonne of King Henry the seventh and of Queene Elizabeth his wife was borne at Winchester the twentieth day of September, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred eighty fixe, and the second of his Fathers raigne. In whole fifth yeere hee was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earle of Chesster, and at the age of fifteene yeeres, one month and twenty five daies, vpon the fourteenth of No-uember, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and one, espoused the Lady Katherine daughter to Ferdinando King of Spain, thee being then about eighteene yeeres of age, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, London; and presently sent into Wales the better to governe that principality by his owne Presence, enjoyed his marriage bed onely foure months and nineteene daies, departing this life at Ludlow the second of Aprill, the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and two, of his Fathers raigne founteneene, and of his owne age fifteene yeeres, fixe months and thir-teene daies. His body with all due funeral solemnities, was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Maries in Winchester, where, in the South side of the Quire here maineth encombed in Touch, or lette, without any remembrance of him by picture.

(73) Henrie the second sonne of King Henry the seventh and of Queene Elizabeth was borne at Greenwich in the Countie of Kent, the two and twentieth of Iune, in the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninety and one, being the seuenth of his Fathers raigne. In his Infancy he was created Duke of Turke and Marshall of England, and fortrained vp in his youth to literature as hee was rightly accounted the best learned Prince in Europe, and by the death of his brother succeeded his Father in all his Dominions; whose Raigne and Acts are presently to be related.

(74) Edmond the third sonne of King Henry and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne in the yeere of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninete five, and in his young yeeres was created Duke of Sommerfet, which Title hee so long time enjoyed, being taken away by death at Bishops Hatfield before hee attained fully to five yeeres of age, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and five, and fiftenth of his Fathers Raigne, and his body lieth interred at Saint Peters in Westminster.

(75) Margaret the eldest daughter of King Henry and of Lady Elizabeth his Queene, was born the nine and twentieth day of November the yeere of Christ 1489. and fifth of her fathers raigne; shee at the age of foureteeene was married vnto James the fourth King of Scotland, the yeere of our Lord one thousand five hundred and three, vnto whom shee bare James the fifth, Arthur and Alexander and a Daughter: which last three, died all of them young; and after the death of King James (being slaine at Flodden Field in fight against the English,) shee was remarried vnto Archebald Douglas Earle of Angus, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and foureteeene, vnto whom shee bare Margaret, afterward espoused vnto Matthew Earle of Lennox, Father by her of the Lord Henry, who died at the age of nine months, and lyeth interred in the vpper ende of the Chancell in the Parish Church of Stepney neere London, vpon whose Graue is engrauen in brasse, as followeth:

Here lieth Henry Steward Lord Darle of the age of three quarters of a yeere, late Sonne and Heire of Matthew Steward Earle of Lennox and Lady Margaret his wife, which Henrie deceased the xlviii. day of November in the yeere of our Lord God. 1545. whose Soule Iesus pardon.

Her second sonne was Henrie Lord Dersley a Noble Prince, and reputed for person one of the goodliest T E E 2 Gentle

Gentlemen of Europe, who married Marie Queene of Scotland, the royall Parents of the most roiall Monarch James the first King of great Britaine, and of the Britaine World. And her third sonne was Charles Earle of Lennox father unto Lady Arbella.

(76) Elizabeth the second daughter of King Henry and Lady Elizabeth his Queene was borne the second day of July, one thousand foure hundred ninetytwo, and died the fourteenth of September and yeere of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninety five, and is interred at Westminster.

(77) Mary the third blossome of the Imperiall

Rois-tree of England, was first wife to Lewis King of France, who lived not long after, and died without issue by her. Her second husband was that Martiall and pompos Gentleman, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

(78) Katherine fourth daughter of this seventh Henry and of Elizabeth his Queene, was borne vpon Candlemas day, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and three, and in the eighteenth yeere of her fathers raigoe, who was called to her part in a far better Kingdome within a short while after.

CHAPTER XXI.

A.D. 1509.

He rich and wise King (Henry the seventh) gone (as is said) the way of all rich, his sonne bearing the same name, a most magnanimous & heroi-cal Prince, succeeded in his Throne ouer all his dominions, as the only true heir vnto the Crowne, by both the houses of Lancaster and Yorke. His birth was at Greenwich in the yeere of Grace, 1491, the twentieth two of Iune: and his youth is trained vp in literature, that he was accounted the most learned Prince of all Christendome, indued with parts most befitting a King, both in lineaments of body, and liberality of minde, besides his ripe knowledge in poli-ticke affaires, and was made the more agreeable to the affections of men, by the consideration of his flourishing age, as hauing not attained vnto nineteen at his fathers death. In his infancy hee was created Duke of Yorke; at twelue yeeres (his brother decessed) Prince of Wales, and at eightene became sole Monarch of the land, when at Westmynster vpon Sunday the twenty fifth of Iune, even the festiual of Saint Iohn Baptist, and yeere of Christ Iesus, 1509. hee with his beauteous Queene Katherine receiued their Crowns at the hands of William Warham Archbishoppe of Canterbury, no Prince giuing better hopes vnto iustice, or seeking the wealth of his subiects more then himselfe.

mince, and the wisest Nobility, with whom hee not only often late, to the great increase of his politike experience; but would also yeeld his authority to their grasse and iarte miserie widomes: Of whom the plaints of Petitioners were so movingly regarded, that Proclamations went forth, with promise of restitution, to them that had bene wronged by Dudley or Empson, two persons that had abused the authority of K. Henric his Father, by enriching their owne coffers, with the viter vndoing of many better subjects. These men, King Henry the seventh had made his Instruments for the finding out of offenders in his penall Statutes, themselves being learned in the lawes, and apt enough to execute their Commissions to the full: for, by their dally informations and recurning of fines, they digged and brought a silver Mine into the Kings Exchequer, some veines whereof by the way, ranne also into their owne coffers, to the great vexation of all, and viter vndo-ing of many: whereas the Noblemen grudged, the Gentry repined, the Commons lamented, and all of them felt the teeth of these ravening Wolves: But the father King departed, and his sonne set on his throne; the complaints of the oppressed so oppressed the King and his Council, that Dudley and Empson were first prisoners to the Tower, and both of them by Parliament attainted of Treason.

(1) Edmund Dudley by descent was a Gentleman, and by profession a Lawyer, having both wit and wordes at will, had hee not abused both to his own destruction. Richard Empson his inferior by birth, was the sonne of a poor Scur-maker, but yet had hee stepped before him to the degree of a Knight: These night-sprung Mulburms that sucked the earthes fatnesse, from far better plumes themselves, saw not the many hands ready to plucke vp them by the rootes, when the season should serue to cleare the land of such weeds: for albeit they had their discharge vnder the Kings owne hand to doe what they did, and their service knowne Crowne service, a matter impugnable, yet no sooner were they left to stand vpon their owne basis, but that they felt the weight of their done wrongs too im-portunabie for them any longer to beare; for so importune were all degrees against them, that Dudley forth with in Gold-hill London was arraigned and condemned to die: and King Henry in progresse, (through the cry of the people) could take no pleasure, till he had sent for Empson into Northamptonshire, where among them hee was arraigned, and received sentence of death, which was so desired and followed, as to satisfie his Subjects, the King sent a speciall writ for their executions, which with gravity of all was performed vpon Tower hill, by taking from them their heades, when they left their riches to be spent by others, and their names to remaine vpon Record for the Caterpillers of those times: whose like if any such liue, shall leaue their heartfull remembrance to the like faines of reprochfull infamy, how pleasing foure the promotion to gotten in their owne eyes shall seeme, or the employments in their selfe conceits accounted profitable to the State.

(4) This iustice of King Henry wanne him great praise of his people, and his charity extended towards London, when that City was sore distressed with famine, by lending fise hundred quarters of corne, great lease, so that neuer any King entered his raigne with better hopes then himselfe. That his person was tall, is not to be doubted, though not like vnto Saul, as some haue alledged, whose report is, that at the siege of Bellaguard, he was higher by the head then any in his Campe, and every ioint proportionable to so royall a stature: but that hee was strong, his many Iuts and Tiles, and fights at Ternoy (most dangerously performed) was manifested vpon them that vnderwent his heauy hand: for at Tilt hee bare downe a man at Armes both horse and all, and threw Sir William Knollys a Knight of great strength to the ground at Barreys, with battell-axe he combated againe one Gist a Germane very strong and tall, and lent him better blowes then he could againe repay.

(5) His glorie thus mounted the Trophee of fame, and young Henry the onely morning starre in this Welkinne Orbe, Pope Julius the second, fearing the further increase of the French, who then had entered into some part of Italy, thought this Prince the strongest pillar whereunto to trust, and the fittest Carde to trumpe the French King, well knowing the fidele that the English Kings had vnto France, and the readinesse of his Subjects to forward that way: whereupon writing his letters vnto King Henry, complained against Lewis the French king, and twelfth of that name, who neither (as hee alledged) offering of God, good fauour, nor confidence, detoured the reuerences of the Clergy, supported the Cardinal William to assert the Papacy, aided in the siege of Bonae, a house of Errora, and the Bretonnely, both traitors to the Papal See, where hee intended to lay the foundation of his Empire, to subvert all Italy, besought him for the pity of our Sauour, and by the vertue of his famous ancestors, (as I vnder-stand the words of the Popes briefe) that neuer forsake the Church of God in distress, and by the fithfull obedience, the strongest hand, so enter into the holy league, they hauing elected him against Lewis, Caput fœderis Italiæ.

(6) And indeed to speake as it was, Lewis much emulated King Henrys greatnesse, fearing that fortune would giue him occasions to make his claime by sword into the Kingdom of France; which the sooner hee did by this holy fathers instigations, and by his Herauld Claremont roughly demanded, the Dutchies of Normandy, Guyen, Aunis and Maine, and with them also the Crowne that king Lewis wore. The Scottish king likewise, in case of Andrew Barton slaine in his Piracies (as the English alledg-ed) by the Admirall of England, accounted the truce broken, and sought the reuenge vpon the Scotts adjoining. Against these two nations young Henry at once prepared, and happily obtained fauour victories against both: but the successe of the one, (though not following precisely the time) we meane to relate before we enter discouise of the other.

(7) The enterprise great which K. Henry meane to vnderprise, hee thought it good wisdom to ioyne amity with Maximilian the Emperour, Ferdinando King of Spain, and many other Princes, holding also correspondence with Pope Julius the second, that basic Pontificall Prelate of Rome: then pro-pounding his purposes in Parliament, sent ouer certaine Nobles before him into France, and afterward followe of them himselfe, pitching downe his Tens before the Towne of Ternoy, where hee raised his royall Standard of the Red-dragon, and begirt the Citie with a strait siege.

(8) To this place Maximilian the Emperour repaired, and to the great honour of Henry entered into his pay, wearing the Croffe of Saint George, with a rose (the Kings badge) as his faithfull Souldier, and receined wages by day for every of his, according to their degree: The French seeing the Towne in distresse, sought the reliefe with victuals, and men, but were so encountered by the king and his company, as that many of their chiefe Captaines were taken, and fise of their Standards wonne, the rest for safeguard of life so posted away, that this conflict was called the battell of Spurres.

(9) Then was the battery brought so neer their walls, that many breaches were therein made, and the Towne by composition yielded vnto the King: whereupon the Earle of Sherburne was sent to see all things safe, who stucke vpon the highest Turret the Banner of Saint George, and tooke the oath of allegiance of all the French Citizens, to acknowledge King Henry their supreme Lord: This done, the King as a Conquerour entered Ternoy, sent thence their Ordinance, dismounted the Turrets, cast down the walls, filled vp the ditches, and fired the Towne, excepting onely the Cathedral Church and Bishops Pallace.

(10) Then when the siege remoued vnto Turnay: about which City King Henry commanded diuers Trenches to bee caft, and placed his Ordinance to such advantage, that none might enter in, or come out of the same. Into this Towne a great number of the French from the Countie adjoining had lately fled, relying much vpon the strength and safety of the place, which indeed had euer bene accounted for inuincible, that this sentence was engraued ouer one of the gates. James sawe a perden too puerile, thus hee neuer left the maiden-head: Notwithstanding, it was yielded vp vnto Henry with ten thousand pounds sterling for the Citizens redemption, who to the number of fourescore thousand, then took their oathes to become his true Subjects, and foure of their principall bare vp the Canopie vnder which the King in triumph-wile entered, having bene before him his sword, axe, speare, and other ornaments of warre, every Citizen holding a staffe-Torch for his light. The safe keeping of this City, the King committed to Sir Edmund Tresham Knight of the Order of the Garter, whom hee there made his Lieutenant, and ordained Thomas Halsey his Almoner the Bishoppe of Turnay. The yeere now spent, and season vsur for the field, a sursate from warre was determined vntill the next spring; whereupon all were shipped for England with full payment, and praise, but Ternin and Turnay stucke heauiely vpon the French mens hearts.

(12) King Henry a Prince of a Maiesticall spirit, most highly offended at these his brothers requests, and threats, was so farr ouergone with fury and rage, that Lewis King at Armes the bringer, was thereby somewhat daunted at his present answer, which he desired might be sent in writing, refusing to carry in words his reply to his Soueraigne. This Heralds wife and welghy request, was forthwith granted, and letters framed to King James demands, answering those importations with rough and round words, which notwithstanding hee neuer read or saw, being slaine in the battell of Bladen, before that Lewis could come to deliuer the same.

(13) For James King of Scots preparing for war, had in the meane while entered the borders, and with his Ordinance battered and wonne the Castell of Norham; making full forward vpon the English. Against whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey made the Kings Lieutenant of the North, at his going in to France, assembled an Army of twenty six thousand strong, vnto whom came his sonne the Lord Admirall of England, with a great supply of good souldiers well appointed for warre. The Earle from Newcastle came vnto the water of Till, and pitched his battell besides a little Towne called Brankfen, vnder Fladen hill, a mountain lying in the North of Northumberland, betwix the riuers of Till and Tweed, where vpon a rising banke, the Scottish hoast had taken the advantage of the ground: vnto King James, Thomas Earle of Surrey sent Kenzie Croft a Portenant at Armes, with proffer of battell to bee done vpon Friday the ninth of September, if so it pleased his Highnesse, who withall carried this message from the Lord Admirall, that hee was come in perion to intifie his A^t against Andrew Barton, and would abide the last drop of his blood in the Vant-gard of the field.

(14) King James most readily accepted the offer, and by his Herald Hay sent the Earle word, that if he were as then in Edinburgh, yet would hee most gladly come to fulfill his desire; and withall sent his letters for the instant occasions giuen him to invade England as hee did. The day approached, and the Scots keeping the higher ground, the Earle marched vpward along the riuer, and by two Bridges passed ouer with his hoast, making full forward, as though he ment either to haue taken into Scotland, or else to circumcut K. James his returne, which hee perceiving, halied downe the hill, putting from him his horie, raised his roiall Standard, and as a most valiant Chieftaine encouraged his Souldiers to the fight.

(15) The Scottish Ordinance discharged from above, overshot the English with very small damage, and the ground of so difficult ascent, gave them the easier access, so that Sir Edmund Howard, who lead a wing to the Vant-gard (whereof his brother the Admirall was Captain) got almost to the height; against whom the Earles of Lennox and Argyle, with their Battels of Speares on foot so violently encountered, that they beat downe, and brake the wing of the English, wherein many were slaine, and the horsemen disbanded, and put to flight; but presently recalled, ioyned themselves againe to the great battell, which by this time had attained to the toppe of the hill. King James that saw this first brunt performed, made full account that the day was his owne, supposing verily the English had fled, and therefore most valiantly hee aduanced forward, not staying for the regard to second his battell, and encountering the Earles Battalion, a bloody fight was performed, with the losse and life of many a man: but strength neere spent, and the Scottish somewhat disioyned, through force of a great shoure of arrows falling among them; Sir Edward Stanley having three bands recruited for the like purpose, with a fresh onfet invaded the open sides of the enemy, whose force was so violent, that the Scots no longer were able to stand, but tooke downe the hill vnto flight, which the Earles of Lennox and Argyle perceiving, did their best to stay them, and fighting most valiantly, themselves were slaine in the same place.

(16) King James then perceiving the wings of his Battell distressed and gone, and that the enemy began to enclose him about, with a stout resolution encouraged his men, willing the to regard the person of their King, their own honor, their valiant Ancestors, and now their present imploiments; that their blood might bee boughte deare to the English, and the Scottish valours recorded for euer in the volumes of fame for this their one daies work; & thereupon rushing among the thickest began a most eager & bloody battell, and piercing through with a strong hand went so far, that hee had almost ouerthrowne the Earles Standard: thus baffled in doubtfull chance, the Lord Howard and Sir Edward Stanley having discomfited the enemy in either wing, returned in the face of the maine battell, and the Lord Dueris with his Horie-men came vpon their backs, so that the Scottish were forced to fight in a round compass, hat being ouer-laid, the Kings Standard was stricken downe, and himselfe most valiantly fighting slaine in the middell of his enemies: with whom died three Bishops, whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrews the Kings base sonne, two Abbots, twelue Earles, and leuenteene Lords,

(17) The next day when the Scots had found the field cleared of enemies, and the English buied to burie their dead : the body of King James was found flaine among the rest, having received many bloody wounds, and most of them deadly : for his sides were sticke thicke with sharpe arrowes, his necke cut into the middell, and his left hand in two places all milt cut quite off. These wounds notwithstanding he was deciered, and knowne by the Lord Dacres and others to bee the King; and thereupon his body bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in lead, was solemnly brought vnto the Monastery of Shine in Surry, where no doubt it was honourably entred : but at the dissolution of that Houle, in the daies of King Edward the sixth, it was (as almost all other Moumements were) disturbed of rest, and throwne into a waste roome among old timber, stone and lead, which John Stowe the Relater saith, himselfe so low : and further declareth (let him bee the Author) that the seruants of Lanercus Young Glacier to the late Querne, being at Shine in new glasing the windowes, either vpon foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the rest : but fanciling the sweet perfumes of the balmes, gaue it to their Master, who opening the lead found therein the Head of a man retaining fauour, though the moisture were cleane dried vp, whole haire both of Head and Beard was redde, which after he had well viewed, and a while kept, he caused to bee buried in Saint Michaels at Woodstreet London, the Church of the Parsh wherein himselfe dwelled.

(18) Notwithstanding this faire tale of John Stowe, John Lesly Bishop of Ross affirmeth, that it was held for certaine, the body thus found, was the body of the Laird Bonbrad then slain in the battell, and that R. James was seene alive the same night at Kells, whence hee passed vnto Ierusalem and there spent the rest of his daies in holie contemplation : but howsoever it is (which hee neuer was seene any more in Scotland, no more then Charles Duke of Burgundy was in this Country after the Battell of Nantes : howbeit his people held a vaine opinion that hee escaped, and would at some shortly returne. This battell was fought vpon the ninth of September, the yeere 1513. and is commonly called the battell of Flodden or Flodden Field : whence with victory, the Earle Generall departed, with the embalmed Body of King James, whom hee presented vnto Querne Katherine, who with the Gaucier of the liaine King, sent the newes of the victorie vnto her Lord King Henrie, then lying in his siege before the Towne Terrine.

(19) But as these his proceedings went prosperously forward, and his fame daily spread in further parts, for the Flemmings (who hitherto had held side with his sades) began to fall off suddenly, & vpon the occasion as followeth. It had becom concluded betwixt King Henrie the seventh, and Philip King of Spaine, that Charles his eldest sonne should marry Marie the younger daughter of the English King, with a Princely Dowry agreed vpon, but shee being young, and not tenne yeeres of age, and the Castilian vnable to giue assurance of her person assigned, that match went not forward during the life of her father, howbeit King Henrie her brother regarding greatly her honour, provided for the marriage, and signified so much to the Counsell of Flanders : who dailied him off with many excuses, & lastly sent him word they could not receive her that yeare.

(20) This therefore gaue Lewis King of France occasion to hammer at a peace, and making Pope Leo his, they both together put it in practise, the reader was Henry to listen thereto, both for the loue he bore to his sister, and for the great regard hee held of the Apollolike See, whence Inulius the second, and this Pope Predecessor had lately sent him a Cappe of maintenance and sword, and by decree of Council giuen him the Title Chryssianissimus; which were received with great thanks and solemnities. The French Kings desire was to marry the said Lady Marie, whose dowrie hee assigned to bee thirty two thousand Crownes by yeere, during her natural life, countenancing further to pay vnto King Henry her brother, the summe of one hundred thousand Crownes annually for five yeeres continuance.

(21) Peace thus concluded, the Lady Marie with an honourable Company was shipped at Dance, the Duke of Neufake, the Marquesse Dorset, and the Earle of Salisbury being her chief conductors, whose fleet had not passed two leagues at Seas, but that sudden tempest arose, and so violently raised the waues, as their Ships were scoured each from others, some into Flanders, some into Calis, and hers with great difficulty stricke in at Bullen, where by Boates her traine was landed, and herselfe borne to the shore in the armes of a Knight. Thence with thirty six Ladies all their Palfeires trapped in crimson Velvet, embroidered with gold, her selfe all in Cloth of siluer, her horses and Chariots in Tiffincloth of Gold, and Crimson velvet set with Goldsmiths worke, morelike an Angell then a humane Creature, mette with King Lewis at Abbe, and there the ninth of October the marriage was solemnized ; where the French so gazed at the newe Queenes beauty, as they could not call their eyes from her attractive raies, nor the iustime King her satisfied with any other obiect which shee was in presence, for (so saith Gaucherardus) hee gaue him selfe ouer to much to behold her most excellent beauty, not considering her young yeeres, being not yett eightene, with the unequalty of his owne expired ; nor the confusion of her weak deuced body. For hauing bene sicke before this his marriage, and not well recovered of his lingering distemp, (though hee set the fairest hew outward) liued with this his faire Querne onely eighty two daies, and then by his death left her to choose another husband to her best liking, which shee thorowly did in her second match.

(22) For thus left a stranger in the French Court, and desirous to returne againe into England, King Henrie her brother, sent Charles Brandon the new made Duke of Suffolke, to conduct the young Querne out of France. This Duke a gallant, and of a goodly presence, so courted his Charge, and carried himselfe in the cle of her melting affections, as his loue entred deeply into her tender heart : which thing indeed King Henrie perceived before, for which cause, as was thought, hee raised him to the grace of a Duke ; howsooner the Gemme thus got, and too precious to bee lost, hee made her his owne, by celebration of marriage, before her past Calis, and thence sent to intreate his Soeraignes consent, who seeing it was bootlesse to refuse what was done, with a light touch of reproofe allowed their nuptials. But her dowrie kept backe by the French, and other grieuances complained of, caused no little troubles betwene the two Realmes as shall be related in place conuenient. In the meane while let it not seeme our tedious if we briefly runne ouer the rising and height of Thomas Wolsey, that possibill Priest, seeing that many dependences of Storie had their eues in the Acts of this man, who with the King reigned together as King, if not before him in managing the State.

(23) His birth was at Ipswich in the County of Suffolke, his parents poore, but of an honest report, and himselfe a good Philosopher, very eloquent and full of wit : his education in youth was at Oxford in Maudlin Colledge, and his first preferment from the Lord Marquise Dorset, who bestowed vpon him a benefice in his gift, in regard that hee was prior vnto his ffonnes, which Sir Amias Paulet so crosse him in, that hee died Wolsey by the feete in the Stockes though afterward hee put this his Act among other his deedes, whereof hee had iust cause to repent : for for the Schollers after no sooner was mounted into the Chancel Bishoppe of England, but that hee laid his command vpon Pauler, and retained him as Prisoner in the Middle Temple the space of 6. yeeres: but in the meane time Marquesse Dorset dying, left Walseyes pillar of hope altogether vnpolished, and the bafe thereof it self vnited vpon any firme ground: so that Walsey now fought his fortune in France: who coming to Calais, became seruant to Sir Iohn Napheur the Treacher of that Towne, where hee carried himselfe with so great discretion, as shortly his master preferred him to the King.

(24) This Scholler hauing thus cast Anchor at Court, the haue of hope, was more then double diligent in the Kings eye, and very seruicable also both to Doctor Frax Bishoppe of Winchester, Secretary, and Lord Prize Seale, as also to Sir Thomas Lawd Master of the Wardes, and Constable of the Treasurie: but most of all vnto Fortuoe, that now sisted occasion to make her selfe famous in this poore Butcherfonne. For King Henry hauing verger bulinelle with Maximilian the Emperour, sent this his Chaplen vnto him in Poll, who polled againe before hee was thought to bee gone, and withal concluded some points forgot in his directions, to the high content of his Soueraigne Lord the King: for the which hee bestowed vpon him the Decree of Lincoller, the worthiest promotion vnder the degree of a Bishoppe: then was hee made the Kings Almoner, and presently following one of the Pruy Counsell: wherein his aduise was so wise, and his persuasions so weighty, that hee was continually employed to berthe expolitor to the King, alwayes carrying a most speciall regard, to preferre his Maiesties will howe soeuer it went, so that his mouth was the onely Organ that euer sounded his pleasure, and freedome from troubles of all State affairs.

(25) But warres hauing beene commenced betwixt England and France, and Turkey loit from the obedience of Lewes, King Henry gaue his Almoner the Bishopricke thereof, and changed his Dranery of Lincoller into the Bishopricke of the same Diocesse, and not long after set also the Miter of York vpon Walseyes Wile-head: whereby hee became (as it were) three Bishopps at once, and now being Primus Anglia, carried himselfe accordingly, by erecting his Crosse in the Kings Court, albeit it were within the Iurisdiction of Canterbury, which seemed vnassurable, the dignity of the Church held then much by Precedency of place, and the giuing way to inferiours, accounted the infringing of all religious liberties: Wherefore William Archbishoppe of Canterbury found himselfe fore agreed to hane the Crosse of York (which owed him obedience) adnanced with his, and that in his presence, for which hee greatly checked the presumption of this proud Prelate.

(26) But Walsey not wanting wherewithall to mate him by the inhabitations of the Kings, both of England and France, obtained to bee made Priest, Cardinal, and Legatus de Latere, vnto whom Pope Lep sent a Cardinals hatte, with bulles of authority in that behalfe, yet were these high Prefates brought in no better a case, then in a mean hudget, which seemeth somewhat distastefull in the new Cardinals eye: wherefore hee commanded a flay to bee made of the hingers approach; and for the greater honour to this honourable present, arrayed him in most costly silkes, becomming so great an Ambassador, who advancing forward, hee caused to be encountered by a number of gallant Gentle men, and a great assembly of Prelates vpon Blacke-heath, by whom hee was conducted with much honour through the City of London, and his Present delineated at Wylminster, attended by many mitred Bishopps and Abbots, with a rich shew of Copes, as if it had been a Kings Coronation.

of an equall, hee obtained the parle with the broad Seale of England, which Archbishoppe Warham had enjoyed long before the death of King Henry the fourth, and was made Lord Chancelour in his roomes: so that besides the puric and mace of that honourable Office, hee had two Crosse and two Pillars, borne euer before him by the tallest Priells that were to bee found in the Realme. To the better maintenance of his chargeable estate, the King bestowed on him the Bishopricke of Winchester, and in Commendation the Abbey of Saint Albans, and with them hee held in Farme, the Bishopricks of Bath, Worcester, and Hersford, enioyed by Strangers incumbents, not residing in the Realme, so that now leeming a monster with tenen heads, and each of them crowned with the Miter of a Bishoppe, let vs thus leaue him dandled in Dame Fortunes cradle, till furnished with dalliance shee call him from thence.

(28) But the state of Londons Trade-men prospered vnder his greatnesse nothing so well, for such was the concourse of strangers, and so much were they borne with, by the superiors, that they abated the English, openly in the market, kept from a Citizens his owne wife with his place, yea, and paid with a small penance for killing an Englishman. Their first were complained of in a Sermon at Saint Maries Spittle, and afterwards assaulted, and much hurt done to their substaunce and hooules, for which riotous offence Iohn Lincoller the onely instigator was hanged; and foure hundred men, boyes, and e-leuen women led in topes along the City in their shirts, and balers about their neckes to the Kingtons Hall at Wylminster, where his Maieity sitting vnder a cloath of estate, pardoned the offences to the great reioycing of the Londoners.

(29) But the losse of Turkey sticking sore vpon the stomacke of the French King, hee sought to redeeme it againe with money, and to that end sent his Ambassadors into England, where it was concluded, that the City should bee deliuered vnto Frances Valis then King of France, paying for the same vnto Henry fixe hundred thousand Crowens in twelve yeeres continuance, that is to say, fifty thousand Crowens a yeere, that the Duke of Alencon should bee recalled out of Scotland, and that the Dauphin should marry the Lady Mary King Henries young daughter, which marriage if so it happened not to take effect at the yeeres of consent, then Turkey should be redeliuered to the English; neither was this forgotten, that the Cardinal should receiue a thousand markes yearly for the renewes of the said Bishopricke, and vpon these Coenants were hostages for further assurance deliuered.

(30) But peace much affected among Christian Princes, and daily increased of most proud Estates, was very much feared would worke alteration in the authority, abate, and great riches of the Clergy, if Kings might haue leasure to looke into their owne charges at home. To bulie their heads therefore from all suspiçon or iealousies, Pope Leo the tenth denied the meanes, by a preparation intended for the holy lands warres, a subiect in shew very religious, howe soeuer the former successes had proued it not pleasing to God, when to recouer the City once holy, and to build vpon that which Christ by prophesie had cast downe, as much Christian blood was spilt to raise those ruinous waile, as there was matter laid to fallen the stones of their first building.

(31) To this end therefore three Legates were sent from the holy See of Rome, one into France, another into Germany, and Cardinal Campius into England, with whom was ioyned Walsey in Commission, who hearing of the ragged reuaine of his fellow Cardinal, sent thore of red cloath vnto Calles, to make them meet followers of so great a Lord; and Campius landed at Dauer, Walsey caused the Townes throw which he should passe, to recieue him with procession: and so being brought by the Gentility of

there mette and receiued by the Duke of Yorkshire, many Knights, but many more Prelates, where in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, he stufte himselfe into his Cardinall Robes, which was edged about with most rich Ermine, and thence rode to London, in more pompe and estate then Chryll did to Ierusalem when Hefanna was sung.*

(32) Eight Mules hee had laden with necessaries belonging, but those made no shew in proud Walshes eyes, therefore twelue more hee sent him to furnish his Pageants through the streets of London, these either wanton, or ashamed to bee wondered at, played the skittish ladies indeed: For in Chespe-side, as this Triumph forth passed, these beasts by breaking their Collers and escap-ping their Leaders, cast their Carriages and Cofers vpon the coldground; whose lids flying open laide mozt of their riches to the sight of the people.
For, from some of them fell olde Breaches, Bootes and broken shooes, from others torne stockings tottered ragges, olde Iron and horie shooes, and for fainting by the way therein was bestowed, and now cast abroad, broken meate, many bones, roasted egges, and crufts of bread, ywille worth the keeping: this Shipwrack made vpon the Shelves of Chespe-side, no need it was to bid the Mulsters to beslitter them, who like good thrifty mariners saued from spoile as much as they could; and trusting vpon their trinkets, laded againe these wantons, with the wealth of the Cardinall, who good many as logging on afore with his Croffes, Pillars, Gilt-axe and Mace, vnto Pauls Church, where hee was mette with many mitred Bishops, and attended vpon to Bath place, where we will leaue him, and returne to the place where wee left.

(33) The vnity agreed vpon betwixt England and France, a meeting was motioned for the two Kings, and to that ende great preparatiou made afwell of the one as of the other. But in the heate of this businesse, King Henry had word that Charles, his Queenes Nephew, and new made Emperour, would visit him in England, which accordingly hee did, accompanied with the Queene of Aragon, and a most Royall Trainee, and was as Royallie entertained by King Henry: the cause of his coming was to hinder the peace concluded with France, for although, this Emperour were young, and but newly established; yet was hee wile and well foresewe the hurt that this amity with France, would bring him, and therefore came in person of purpose to disswade the Kings mind and to stay his countance with the French if he could, but finding Henry so forward in those proceeds, hee baited his hooks with goldeu gifts to the Cardinall, and wanne him wholly to his deuotion.

(34) King Henry passing the Seas vnto Calis, met with King Francis at a place appointed, and for that purpose newly built betwixt the Townes of Ginsnes, and Arde: where to describe the lusts, Banquets, and Maskes were to fill vp (with Hall, Grafton and Hensford) whole sides of excessive great Cost. At Calis also the same time the Emperour, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutcheffe of Sauoy landed, whither King Henry and his Queene repaired, to the no little grudge of the French King, though he kept it to himselfe, and consented vnto the ancient league tripartite betwixt these three Monarches, which done the Kings returned into their owne Realmes.

(35) Disputations shortly arising betwixt the Em-perour and the French King, King Henry assaid to bring the to peace, but that failing, fell himselfe from the French, imputing the fault vnto Francis for suborning the Sens against him, and King Francis againe laid all the blame in the Cardinall, accusing him of disimulation, abhorred practises and what not: but wherefoer say the defect, the Duke of Albany was sent into Scotland, the French followed a Spanish ship fraught with the goods of English Merchants vnto Morgate, and tooke her euen in the Kings Streams, in both which King Francis excusing himselfe with ignorance, allured no breach of truce broken by him.

(36) Then was it thought best by the Cardinalls advice to repay like with like, and therefore counselled his King, to reare Charles Duke of Burbon against France, and to perswade him to invade the very heart thereof, encouraging him with sufficient pay, and making him his Champion generall of the Field; whilst the Emperour likewise held him play against Millen. And to that end was sent in way of loane to the Emperour a great summe of money, and forreine Princes solicited to take armes against France, for effecting which, King Henry sent his Ambassadors to the States of France and Switzerland with these instructions as followeth.

(36) That whereas in a treatie of peace it was concluded betwixt the Emperour, King Henry, and Francis the French King, that if any Controuersies should arise betwixt any two, the Prince not inuading should giue aide and assistance against the in-uader: but now the Emperour being inuaded by the French Kings Captaines in the Realme of Na-uarre, and in his owne Countrey by Robert de la March, and others by his procurement, and our King (said they) being often called vpon by the Emperour, hath often entreated the French King to succurre, but hath nothing obtained besides faire words and detraction of promises. Complaining likewise that in the intercourse of these busineses, the French King contrary to his Oath had sent the Duke of Albany into Scotland (in contempt of King Henry) and to the great danger of the young Kings death or deposition, he being the next in blood to succeed, and to the dishonour of the Queene mother, had caused a separation betwixt her and her lawfull husband the Earle of Angoulme. That the French King had detained the payment compounded for the delivery of Turkey, and kept backe the dowry of his sister Ragene Dowager of France, that he had entreated the rebellious Subjects of King Henry, and spoiled his Merchants both by Land and Sea. Neither was wremembered the danger that the Francia stood in, if the Realmes of Naples, and Sicilie, the Seigniories of Teane, and Mellane were lost from the Empire. These therefore seemed faire proiects vnto King Henry for him to warre against France, and to that end, a generall Muster by Commission was taken of all able men from sixteen yeers old and upward, of euery Humber, Shire, Barron, Citie, Hundred, and Shire, throughout England, which seemed to many another Domesday Booke: and yet was there neither peace nor warre against France.

(37) In this great and holly preparation, Charles the Emperour as hee passed toward Spain, landed at Douer, where King Henry mette him, and in great estate brought him to London; which was so prepared with Ornamentes and Pageants, as if it had been the Kings Coronation, and in the Blacke-frices the Emperour was lodged in a most Princely Palace new built by the King; then was hee feasted at Winster, where hee ate in his state, in his Mantle and Garter, and by receiving the Sacrament these two Potent Monarches tooke their Corporal Oathes to observe the Couenants concluded betwixt them: whereof one was, that the Emperour Charles agreed to stay for, and take to wife the young Princess Lady Marie, King Henry then onely daughter, and in such golden bands of loue, Charles and Henry, seemed to be linked, as in London this sentence was set vp in the Guild-hall ouer the doore of the Councill Chamber, where it still remaineth.

is no marvell, for Charles chosen Emperour, was scarcely confirmed, but to purchase the Popes favour, he directed forth a solemne Writ of Out-lawry against Martin Luther, who then had given a great blow to the Papall Crowne. And King Henry likewise was renowned in Rome, for writing a booke against the said Luther: vnderpropping the tottering or downe-fall countenance of the Popes pardons, which Luther shrewdly had shaken; the Pope therefore to shew himselfe a kind father vnto those his fowles, gaue them these Tales; which in truth were none other, then the faine which they sware vnto, when the Crownes of their Empires were first set vpon their heads. But with what acceptance his Holinesse received King Henrys booke, his owne Oracion solemely made at the deliuey thereof vnto M. Iohn Clarke the pfeester and Kings Ambassador, in his Consistory, and in presence of his Cardinals sufficiently doth shew, the translation whereof we haue inserted as we finde it in the Originall it selfe.

Wee doe receive this booke with all alacritie: it is iudged such as there could not bee anything finer vs, and our venerable brethern, more acceptable then it is. For the King himselfe, a most mighty, most prudent, and most truly Christian Prince, wee know not whether we may more prayse or admire, being the first that by warre with happy successe hath subdued the enemies of the Church of Christ, that seek to rend Christs coat, and at last overcoming the enemies, hath restored peace to the Church of God, and to this holy See. But now againe to loue a Monster, both to vnderstand, to beare, and willing to write this booke, hee hath shewed himselfe no more admirable to the whole world for his elegant style, then for his wit. We humbly giue thanks to our Creator for giuing such a Prince to defend his Church, and this holy See, desiring the same God to grant to this his King a happy life, and all his desires, and after this life in his heavenly Kingdome, to keepe for him an everlasting Crowne. And we do farre as we are able to entreat of God, will neuer bee wanting to the said most wise King in the faculties granted to vs of God.

(40) To manifest which his readinesse, himselfe among his Cardinals decreed an augmentation vnto King Henrys royall Seile to bee annexed vnto his others; confirming the same by his Bull, which that it perishe not by the deuouring teeth of Time, we haue here published from the originall Parchment, and leadeen faile it selfe, as followeth.

(41) Leo Episcopus seruus seruus Dei, &c. Leo Bishop servant of the seruants of God; to our most dearely beloued Sonne in Christ, Henry King of England defender of the Faith, health and Apostolicall Benediction. Wee by diuine permission, the chiefe ouerser for the government of the vniuersall Church, though vnassisted for so great a worke, doe proue forth the cogitations of our heart, that the Catholike faith without which no man can attaine to saluation, may receive continual increase, and that those good lawes and constitutions decreed by the wisdom and learning of such as are in authority, especially the faithfull in Christ, for restraining the attempts of all that labour to pervert the same, or by wicked heresies seek to pervert and obscure it, may prosper with perpetuall increase, doe bestow our paines and utmost endeuour in our office and Ministry. And like as the Roman Bishops our Predecessors, were wont to shew especiall fauour to Catholike Princes (according as the quality of matters and times required) especially to them that in troublesome times, when the madnesse and perfidious dealing of Schismatics and heretikes most of all abound, did abide constant and vnmoueable, not onely in humilitie of faith and pure deuotion to the holy Roman Church, but also as the most legitimate sounes and valiant Champions of the same, opposed themselves both with mind and body against the furious madnes of Schismatics and heretikes: so likewise also doe wee desire to extoll your Maiesty with worthy and immortall praises, for your high and immortal desires and labours towards vs, and this holy See, wherein by Gods permission wee sit, to grant vnto it those things for which it ought to beate, and drinke away the Weales from the Lords flocke, and to cut off with the materiall sword rotten members, which infect the myssicall body of Christ, and to conuince the hearts of the faithfull in foundation of helasse. Now where of late our beloued Sonne Iohn Clarke your Maiesties Orator with vs, being to our Consistory before our venerable brethren of the holy Roman Church, the Cardinals and many other Prelates of the same, exhibited a booke vnto vs to bee examined and allowed of vs, which booke your Maiesties selfe (who doth all things with diligence and nothing vnprofitably) framed with charity and zeale to the Catholike faith, and with ardent deuotion toward vs and this holy See, hath composed, as a most worthy and seruicable Antidote against the errors of diuers heretikes, often condemned by this holy See, and of late stirred up and brought in by Martin Luther: And your said Orator hath also largely declared vnto vs, that your Maiesty is ready, and purposeth, like as you haue conuicted the notorious errors of the said Martin, by true reason and unquenchable authorities of sacred Scripture, and ancient fathers, so you will punish to the uttermost of your power, all those of your whole Kingdome, that shall presume to follow, or defend them: and we haue diligently and exactly perused, and we are the admirable doctrine of your said booke, watered with the dew of beaurate Grace, and doe heartily thanke Almighty God, from whom every good and perfect gift doth come, who hath vouchsafed to conuince your Noble mind, inclined to every good thing, and to exude you with secret Grace from heauen, as to vnto those things; whereby you are able to defend his holy faith, against such a new inuasion of damned errors, and also incite by your example all other Christian Kings and Princes, to be willing to fauour and further with all their best aid the Orthodoxall faith, and Evangelicall truth, whensoever it bee brought into danger or doubt. And wee thinke it also meete, that they who haue undertaken such costly labours for the defence of the faith of Christ, should haue all praise and honour of vs; and wee are desirous, that not onely the things themselves which your Maiesty hath written, being both of most sound doctrine, and no lesse eloquence, should bee extolled and magnified with empyent commendations, and alwaies and confirmed by our authority; but also that your Maiesty should bee graced with such an honour, and such a Title, as that both forer time and neuer increase all men might perceive how gratefull and acceptable this gift of your Maiesties hath been vnto vs, especially offered vnto vs now at this time. Wee, who be the true successors of Peter, who in Christ at his ascension into heauen left his Peter on earth, and to whom hee committed the care of his flocke: Wee say, who sit in this holy seate, from which all dignities and titles doe flow, upon mature deliberation had with our said brethren about these things, haue by the general agreement, and consent of them decreed, to bestow vpon your Maiesty this title, namely, THE DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And accordingly by these Presents doe we giue you with such a title, commanding all faithfull Christians, that they name your Maiesty with this Title, and when they write to you, that after the Word KING, they adioine DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And truly wee diligently considering and weighing your singular merits, were not able to bestow vnto a name more worthy and commendable for your Maiesty, then the excellencie and dignity of this Title, which so often as you shall heare and reade so often you may call to mind this your singular vertue and great desert, nor may you by this Title puffe up your selfe in pride, but according to your wonted prudence become more humble, and bee more valiant and constant in the faith of Christ, and in deuotion to this holy See, by which you haue beene exalted, relieving in the Lord the grief of all good things, leaving this as a perpetual immortall monument of your glory to your children, shewing them the way vnto the like, that if they shall desire to be graced also with such a Title, they must labour to do such works, and to follow the excellent steps of your Majesty, whom according as you have well deserved of us, and thus said See, together with your wife, and all your children that shall be borne of you, or of them, we beseech with our Benediction, with a large and liberrall hand in the name of H I M, from whom the power of granting this blessing is given unto us, praying and beseeching that Almighty One, who saith, By mee Kings raigne, and Princes rule, and in whose hands are the hearts of Kinges, that hee will confirme your Majesty in your holy purpose, and increase your devotion, and by your worthy endeavours for the sacred faith, so to illustrate your reuerence, and make you glorious through all the world, that this our Testimony which wee have given of you, adorning you with this excellent a Title, may never be induged by any to be false or vaine. Ego Leo X. Catholicae Fidei Episcopus Sanctiss.

With twenty five other Cardinals and Bishops, underwriting their severall names with their owne hands.

(42) But from these Priestly and Papall gratulations, let vs returne to leade our Story vnto temporall Princes affaires. How the Emperour Charles had bene entertained in King Henrie Court, wee have said, and now ready to depart with many rich gifts, wee repaired to Southampton, where hee tooke his shippes for Spaine, whose conductor through the narrow Seas was Thomas Earle of Surrey, Lord high Admirall of England, who having waited him vnto Biscay with a gallant crew of Gentlemen, made thence laie into France, and in Britaine belieged & wonne the strong Towne Morlaix, and with the Garrison Souldiers of the Marches dayly bickered with the heart-burning French, and dayly went away with the better, but new fires areared by the Scots, the Lord Admirall was recalled, and came to the Court, where hee declared to his Highnesse what hee had done in Britaine.

(43) King Henries businesse thus on foot in France, hee thought to pursue it with all the advantage hee could, and first to find the Scots play, who were euer fast friends to the French, hee sent the Lords Resse and Daeres to secure the North-borders, appointing for his Lieutenant in those partes the Earle of Shrewsbury, and sent the Lord Admirall of England againe into France, who diuided his Army into three Battalions, the first whereof, was led by Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater: the Middle, the Earle conducted himselfe, with the assistance of his brother Lord Edmund Howard, and the Rearward was governed by Sir William Sande, and Sir Richard Wraye both of them Knights of the Order, the Coucennell of the horse was Sir Edward Gouffier.

(44) These in September entred into the French Pale, and made toward the Castell of Hesling, vnto whom ioined the Burgundians, sent from the Lady Margaret then Regent of Flanders, vnder whose colours serued many Spaniards; Surrey thus set forward, burned all things where he came, demolishing the Castles and Townes of Selhor, Brambridge, Senecker, Tuningham, Mauffier, Norbion, Daerac, Culmberge and Pringers the Townes and Churches fortified of Beards, Pass, and Saint Mary de Bois: but laying his siege against Hesling was forced for want of battering peeces, to breake vp againe and depart: In whole returne hee burnt the Townes and Castles of Durlew and Derrier, and comming to Calles, set saile for England with a wonderfull great Booty.

(45) In this while the Duke of Albanie being made Gouernour of Scotland with an Armie of fourescore thousand drew vnto the Borders, whence hee sent into France for six thousand Almains, which were promised, and daily expected though in vain, for none came at all. The Earle of Shrewsbury with eight and twenty thousand strong, drew likewise towards the Borders, but the Scots lying still, without further insaution, an abstinence from warre was betwixt them concluded, which how the English kept, the sequell well sheweth for the King ordaining Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the whole Marches, hee either refrained to impeach his honor by breach of truce, or else loth to be disquieted of his soft rest, made meanes to the King, to be discharged of the office, which was forthwith bestowed (and thankfully accepted) vpon Thomas Earle of Surrey lately returned out of France, who deliuered the charge of the East & Middle Marches vnto the Lord Marquisse Darsy, and the West vnto the Lord Daeres, who presently made a road into Scotland, and returned with booty.

(47) Among other great esteeme of this magnanimous Monarch, it was not the least that the Emperour in person had twice come into England to visite him, and euen at this time Christian King of Denmarke with his Queene, vnto whom Queene Katherine was Aune, landed at Dover, and was honourably brought vnto London, where they were royally leached, and after two and twenty dayes intertainment, receiuing great gifts of the King and Queene, they returned to Flanders, where hee remained as a banished man out of his owne Country.

(49) The Sentiſſ (as we haue said) keeping the Borders, and the English making inroades, where the places were weakest, the stirres betwixt them began daily to increafe. In so much as the Duke of Albany sent a Herald vnto the Earle of Surrey the Kings Lieutenant of the North, to offer him Bartell, promising on his honour if hee tooke him Prisoner, his ranfome should be easie, and his person consecretly dealt with; who returned as rough an answer, as the offer was kinde, saying hee would abide Battell if he durst give it up of the Duke were taken either by him or us, hee would strike off his head and send it for a present to his Majestie the King of England. So moved was the Earle againe the French, that had raised Albany thus against England, and King Henry (as Bishop Lesly reporteth)ooke from the Scots inhabiting England all their goods, sending them into their Countrey on foot, with white Croffes sewed upon their uppermost Garments by which they were knowne and suffered to passe. The Scots vpon the Earles answer were wonderfully enraged, and seeking the revenge, some of them passed ower the water, and hotly besieged the Cattle of Warke, which the Englishmen as valiantly defended, and in their resistance slew almost three hundred of their French Souldiers, the Scots retrying againe to their Campe.

The Duke of

(50) The Regent not able to digest the Earles pill, commanded his Armie to march forward into the English Marches, wherewith the common Souldiers much rejoiced, but the wiser of the Nobility vrged this in their Counsell, that having displayed in warlike manner, their Banners vpon the Verge of the Borders, and defended their Countrey from the spoile, they saw no great reason further to proceed, no necessity or cause moving, besides the Quarrell of the French: and therupon repaying to the Regent, they demanded why they should proceed farther, alleading that at his commandment (yea and their willing) they had so farre passed, for the defence of their Countrey, which was sufficient without further invasion of the others, the time to consent in the marriage of their young King, and the action so dangerous, wherein all the Peerey of Scotland were assembled, to attend and suffer the doubtfull issue of warre, which ever is vncertaine, and more losse in one battell many times suffered, then gaine can be gotten in manie: whereof too too lamentable experience (saide they) we have had by King James, that by peace and life, brought Scotland to her bell, but by his warre and death almost to the worst, therefore would we know (saide the Nobilitie) whether this your intent stands with the weale of the King and vs, or else is prosecuted in the cause of your selfe and the French.

(51) The Duke making some pause, lastly replied and said; "This question would have bene demanded ere now: for well you know, that from Scotland I beare my name, honour and linage, have passed the Seas from the noble Realme of France, for the love of my Countrey, to set you in amity which were at disension, by whose division your Realm lay prostrate to destruction and Conquest, for whole aid you see I have procured the French to joine with you against the English. Againe, when these warres were determined by Parliament, you made me your Capitaine, authorizing me to invade England with Banner displayed, thou was no question or demand of the cause; neither have I entered the quarrell without your agreement; and therefore may I iustifie my present doing, and yet to me it seemeth there is cause sufficient, with fire, sword and blood, to enger England, if we be not too forgetfull, and will submit our selves to dishonour and reproach: for we all know that the Realme of Scotland is ours by inheritance, and that portion of the world allowed to our Nation to enjoy; how can we warre better, then to maintain our naturall inheritance, against which the English give daily attempts, with manslaughter, murders, thefts and spoiles: have we not then, (thinke you) iust cause to make warre? The defence of a kingdome, is the office of a king, the honour of the Noble, the service of the Souldier, and the duty of a naturall Subject. But be it as you will, yet hauing lo payntaine an armie to avoide our owne reproach, and encouragement of the Enemye, let vs campe here still on the Borders till we see what the English men intend.

(52) But Margaret Queene of Scots soliciting her brother for a peace, the shirres brake up for a time, as Archbishop Francis did thence after, by the working wit of Cardinal Wolsey, who in the State affaires was ever one, which made him the more emulated, and the grievances of the common: ever call vpon him; in so much that it was commonly spoken he was the cause of the heavy imposition granted to maintaine the kings warres, which was so importable to the poorer sort of Subjects, as the payment thereof was vterly denied to the appointed Collectors, with weepings, Cries and great exclamations, yea and almost grew to an open rebellion: for Kent denied it to the Lord Cobham: Essex refused to commune with the commissioners: Huntingdonshire refused, and would not heare them; London would be taxed by none but their Aldermen: and Suffolke rose vp in Armes, making poverty their Capitaine. Of these shirres when King Henry heard, he had great indignation, blaming the Counsellors, and wrote his letters vnto every County, that no such demands should be paid: and the Cardinal to carry fauours with the Commons gave it forth foolishly, that at his intercession the Offenders were pardoned, and the money remitted.

(53) And now more to shew his owne power, then any great cause; hee beganne to aminate the heart of King Henry against his Nephew the Emperour, and caused him to withhold pay from the Duke of Barboun his late made Generall: which was the cause of the French Kings Captivity. For Barboun incamped within the Towne of Paula, and besieged by the French in most warlike manner, was for want of his said pay so desperate of life, that he attempted almost dangerous escape. In the dead of the night he set a part of his Company to affilie the enemy on that side of the Towne which was left strong, himselfe sliding secretly out of a Posterne on the contrary side: The watch but slender and the Souldiers asleepe, a great terror arose, in which the besieger turned their Ordinance to the place of the cry, when as suddenly Barboun was at their backs, and winning their Ordinance discharged them against their owners, flew their souldiers, cut downe their Tent, and by the Vice-roy of Naples was the French King taken prisoner in the Field.

(54) This fortunate successe made these Almaines more bolde, who presently with the Imperiall Ensignes marched towards Flourance, and thence to Rome, vnto whose walls in one day they gave three assaults, in the last whereof Charles Duke of Barboun their Generall was slaine; notwithstanding the City was taken and sacked; Pope Clement in the meane while, to make all sure as he thought, thundered out his Curfew, and with Boll, Beake and Candle, committed those Lutherans to Hell, who neuerthelesse broke down that windy Balkwarke, and with great slaughter forced him with twentie three Cardinals, into the Cattle of Saint Angelle, where they kept them besieged from the first of May, vnto the tenth of December: in which time, in mocking of the Pope the souldiers made folace, would apparell one in Pontifical attire, who sometime should blesse them, and sometime accurse them, and riding on Horse-backe with a Whore sit behind him should so passe the streets, that the Pope and Cardinals might see him. Their contumelies and Papall Captivities were grievously taken by many Christian Princes, informent that Cesar in Spain forbade all Enterludes to be plaid, and Pageants prepared forioy of the birth of his sounge, Prince Philip, to be pallad downe. In France by the Court of Parliament the Duke of Barboun was condemned of Treason, his name and memoriall accursed, his Armes paid downe, and his Lands and goods confiscated; neither would King Henric of England answer the Emperours letters, wherein hee excused himselfe from hauing any hand in the action.

Troubles in Ire-

(55) Whilst these things were in working at Rome, arose great troubles in Ireland, the Keris casting off all obedience, and killing the Kings subjects where they found them: against whom Thomas Howard, Earle of Surrey, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom, made forth his power, and followed them himselfe with such danger of life, that the valor of his Helmet was shot off, as hee pursued the enemy through the desert woods: but these Rebels cut off by his high valour, and warres proclaimed as one time against Scotland and France, the Lord Lieutenant was recalled into England; and Piers Butler Earle of Ormy made Depuie of Ireland in his stead; betwixt whom, and Gerald Fitz-Gerald, Earle of Kildare, whose sister hee had married, arose no little strife and debate, which grew to that height as King Henry sent Commissioners to trie and examine the differences, which was so cleared on Kildare's behalfe, that Ormy was discharged of his Office, and the Lord Fitz-Gerald swore depuie in his place; whereas Cardinal Wolsey, whose hand chiefly directed all states affaires, a deadly enemy to the Earle of Kildare was highly offended, and to undermine the foundations of this his new Government, gave care unto Ormy, who accused the new depuie of many mild manners, among which these were the principall; that he winked at Desmonds escape whom he should have attached by order from the King: that he grew oer familiar with the native Irish; and that hee pot to death the Kings best subjects: for these the Lord Depuie was commanded into England, in whole absente Ormy his enemie was againe chosen Lord Depuie by the Kings Council, but himselfe none of the wisest for politticke Government, was altogether therein ruled by his wife, and shee made it no courttesie to abole her husbands honour against her natural brothers folly: who now in England must answer his demerits before the Lords of the Councell, and to their Table was hee brought, where the Cardinall Lord Chanceller made his faults nothing lesse, and thus addressed himselfe against the Earle of Kildare.

The Cardinall
speaks at the
against Kildare.

(56) "I wot well (my Lord) that I am not the meekest at this boord to charge you with these treasons, because it hath pleased some of your Pew-fellowes to report, that I am a professed enemy to all Nobilitie, and namely to the Giraldines: but seeing every shrewd boy can say as much when he is controuled, and they points to weighty, that they should not be dissembled of vs, and so apparant, that they cannot be denied of you: I must haue leave (notwithstanding your false slander) to be the mouth of these honourable Lords at this present, and to trumpe your treasons in your way, howsoever you take me first you remember, how the lewde Earle of Desmond your kinsman (who passeth not whom hee leueth might hee change his Master) sent his Confederates with letters of credence unto Francis the French King: and having but cold comfort there, went to Charles the Emperour proffering the helpe of Monsieur, and Cambray, towards the Conquest of Ireland, if either of them would helpe to win it from our King Henry: many letters, what precepts, what messages, what threats, haue beene sent you to apprehend him, and yet not done! Why so? Forsooth I could not catch him! Nay, say Earle, forsooth you would not watch him: If hee bee iustly suspected, why are you partiall so to great a charge! If not, why are you fearful to haue him tried? Yea, for it will bee sworn and depoued to your face, that for feare of meeting him, you haue winked wilfully, flattered his sight, altered your counsell, warned your friends, stopped both eares and eyes, against his detectors, and whensoever you took vpon you to hunt him out, then was hee sure afore hand to be out of your walke. Surely, this mingling and false play, little became either an honest man called to such honour, or a Noble man put in so great trust:

"had you lost but a Cow or a Horse of your own, two hundred of your retainers would haue come at your Whille to rescue the prey from the vitermost edge of Wylster: all the Irish in Ireland must haue giuen you the way. But in pursuing to needfull a matter as this was; mercifull God, how nice, how dangerous, bow wayward haue you bene? One while hee is from home, and another while hee keepeth home, sometimes fled, sometimes in the Borders, where you dare not venture. Y wisse, my Lord, thee bee strowed bogges in the borders, for the Earle of Kildare nor feare; the Earle, say the King of Kildare: for when you are disposed, you raighe more like them rule in the land: where you are pleased the Irish for standeth for a just Subject: beards and hands, liues and lands are all at your courttesie: who fawneeth not thereon, cannot rest within your liueland, and your smell so rancke, that you tricke them out at pleasure. Whilst the Cardinall was speaking, the Earle chafed and changed colour & at last brake out, and interrupted him thus.

(57) "My Lord Chanceller I beseech you pardon me, I am short witted, and you I perceive intend a long tale. If you proceed in this order, half my purgation will be lost for lack of carriage: I haue no Schoole tricks, nor art of memory: except you heare me while I remember your words, your second proccesse will hammer out the former. The Lords associate, who for the most part tenderly looe Kildare, and knew the Cardinall his manner of taunts to ready being inured therewith many yeeres together, humble besought hit graue to charge him directlie with particulars, and to dwell in some one matter vntill it were examined thoroughly.

(58) That granted: It is good reason (quoth the Earle) that your Grace beare the mouth of this boord: but my Lord, those mouths that put these things into your mouth, are very wide mouths: such iocodes as haue gaped long for my wracke: and now at length for want of better Busse, are faine to fill their mouths with smoke: what my Cousen Desmond hath compassed, as I know not, so I bestrew his naked heart for holding out so long. I beleeue hee is taken by mine agents that presently wait for him, then haue mine aduersaries bewailed their malice: and this heape of beinuous wordes shall resemble a Scarre-Crow, or a man of straw that seemeth at a blush to carry some proportion, but when it is felt and peized, discouereth a vanity serving oonly to feare Crows: and I verily trust your honours shall see the prooff by the thing it selfe, within these few daies. But goe to suppose he neuer be had? What is Kildare to blame for it more then my good brother of Ormy, who, notwithstanding his high promises, hauing also the Kings power, is yet content to bing him in at leisure? Cannot the Earle of Desmond shift but I must be of Councell? Cannot hee hide him except I wink? If he be close am I his master? If he be friend am I a traitor? This is a double kind of accusation which they vye against me, wherein they are shelled and mired at my first denall. You would not see him (say they) who made them so familiar with mine eie-sight? Or when was the Earle within my view? Or who stood by when I let him slip? Or where are the tokens of my wilfull hodgepodge? But you sent him word to beware of you: who was the messenger? Where are the letters? Concoine my neglige, see how loose this idle geare haegeth together. Desmond is not taken: well, you are in fault: why? Because you are: who propheth it? No body: What Conscience? So it seemeth: To whom? To your enemies. Who rold it them? They will sweare it. What other ground? None: Will they sweare it my Lord? why then of like they know it, either they haue mine hand to shew, or can bring forth the messenger, or were present at a Conference, or pri-

"use to Defend, as I come body bewraide it to them, "or they themselves were my Carriers or vicege-
 "rents therein: which of these parts will they choofe, "for I know them too well. To reckon my life "consult by their bare wordes, or beadlelike sayings, "or feutricake oathes, were but mere mockerie. My "letters were soone read, were any such writing ca-
 "sant, my seruants, and friends are ready to be list-
 "ned: of my Cosen of Defmond they may lie "loudly, since no man here can well contrary "them. Touching my selfe I neuer noted in "them much wit, or so fall faith, that I would haue "gaged on their silence the life of a good bound,
 "much lesse mine owne: I doubt not, may it please "your honors to appose them, how they came to "the knowledge of those matters which they are so "ready to depose: but you shall find their tongues "chained to another mans trencher, and as it were "Knights of the Post, suborned to say, swear and "stare the vitermost they can, as those that passe not "what they say, nor with what face they say it, so "they say no truth: but on the other side, it grieueth
 "mee, that your good Grace, whom I take to bee "wise and sharpe, and who of your blessed disposi"tion witheth mee well, should bee so farre gone in "crediting these corrupt Informers that abuse the "ignorance of your state and Country to my peril.
 "Little know you (my Lord) how necessary it is,
 "not only for the Governour, but also for eury "Nobleman in Ireland, to hamper the vniuall "neighbours at discretion, wherein if they waited "for proceffe of law, & had not those liues and lands
 "you speak of within their reach, they might hap"pily looke their own liues & lands without law. You "hear of a case as it were in a dream, & feele not the "man that vereth vs. In England there is not a man "so subiect that dare lend his hand to fillip a Peere "of arealm: In Ireland except the Lord haue cunning
 "to his strength, and strength to face his Crowne,
 "and sufficient authority to take theues and varlets
 "when they stir, he shall find them (warre so fall
 "that it will bee too late to call for iustice. If you "will haue our seruice take effect, you must not "tie vs alwayes to these iudiciall proceedings wher-
 "with your Realme (thanked be God) is iured.
 "Touching my kingdom, I know not what your "Lordshippe should mean thereby. If your Grace "imagine that a Kingdome consisteth in seruing "God, in obeying the Prince, in governing with "loue the common wealth, in supporting subiects,
 "in suppressing rebels, in executing iustice, in brid-
 "ling blind affections, I would bee willing to bee "inuested with so vertuous and roiall a name: but if "therefore you team me a King, in that you are per"suaded that I repine at the government of my loue"raign, or wink at malefactors, or oppress ciuill li-"uers: I verily disclaime that odious term, maruelling "greatly that one of your Graces profound wisdom "would seepe to appropriate so sacred a name to so "wicked a thing: but howsoever it bee (my Lord)
 "I would you and I had changed Kingdome, but "for one month. I would truit to gather vpp "more crummes in that space, then twice the reue-"nues of my poore Earldome: but you are well "and warre, and so hold you, and vpbraide not "mee with such an odious terme. I flumber in a "hard Cabine, when you sleepe in a soft bedde of "Downe: I herue vnder the Kings Cope of bea-"uen, when you are serued vnder a Canopie: I "drinke water out of my skull when you drinke "wine out of golden cups: my Courier is trained "to the field, when your Gennet is taught to am"ble: when you are graced & belorded, & crouched "and kneeled vnto, then find I small grace with our "Irish borderers, except I cut them off by the knees.
 "At these girde the Lord Chancellor most fretted, "and finding Kildare to bee no base deferred the hea"ring of his cause, till more proofes were produced "from Ireland; then in a great fume hee arose from the Councell board, and committed the Earle vnto prison, against the minds of most at the Table, who knew well, that this his accusation was more of haured borne by the Cardinall, then any occasion given by the accused late Deputy. Whereupon Thomas Duke of Norfolk shropt to the King, and cra-ued that Kildare might bee his prisoner, offering to bee bound in goods and body for his forth com-ming, whom hee obtained, though with no great liking of the L. Chancellor, who daily entertained new plaines against him, till at last hee pressed him fore with letters sent to Oswald and Desaur, to encourage their rebellions against Oswald the Lord Deputy; which letters were brought them by his own daughter and their sisters, the Lady Elise Fitzgould wife to the Baron of Slane.

(19) This presumption being vehement, the King suspicious, the Cardinall eager, and his friends faint, Kildare was sent to the Tower, where hee committed himselfe to God, and expected daily his death, but with such couragious resolution, as hee being in play with the Lieutenant as slide-groat, when the mandate was brought for his execution on the next morning, and seeing the Lieutenant stracke into a suddaine fadnesse; by Saint Brule, Lieutenant (quoth the Earle) there is some madde game in that crowle; but fall how it will, this throw is for a huddle: and when the worst was told him, now I pray thee (quoth hee) doe no more but learne assuredly from the Kings owne mouth, whether his Highnesse be witting thereto or no; the Lieutenant louing his prisoner well, repaired to the King, and shewed him the Cardinalls warrants, who then controuled the shewies of the Priests (for those were his earmes) and gaue the Lieutenant his Signer for a countermand, wherat the Cardinall fumed, but Kildare delivered from his eminent death, and not long after from his imprisonment also, was sent into Ireland, where at his entrance into Dublin, he was met with a solemne procession, and so brought into the City; so wellbeloued was this Earle abroad, and at home.

(60) But the French Kings fortunes were nothing so good, who was straitly imprisoned at Madrid in Spain, and great sure made for his deliuerance, which notwithstanding would not be heard. The Queene mother then Regent of France, wife of her selfe, and forwarded by others, saw no better means to free her sonne the King, then to enter amity with England, which to accomplish, she solicited King Henry working vpon the occasions then ministred, which was some vnkindnesse growne betwixt the English King, and the Emperour, the one of them more strange by the greatness of his fortunes, and the other in iacobulie of lessening renowne. The sparks of which Cinders were flied to flame, by Wesley that cuer was in the care of the King: allending his potency, so much esteemed of all Christian Princes (a sound very true in Henries wide care) would bee lesse regarded by the Emperours late victory; who now beganne to carry himselfe with another respect, and neuer after that victory goun-ten subscribed his letters to King Henry, according to his accustomed manner, your Sonnet and Cosen; but to the draught of his Secretaries, infused his hand with the word Charles and no more.

(61) These dislikes and other intercourses of State, drew Henry shortly to a peace with France.
 In the exemplification of which league the Venetians, and other Princes were left to their choise, wherof himselfe notwithstanding would bee filed the Protector. And to his leaguer Ambassadors sent these instructions to moue the Sentes to consider the Emperours aspired greaxnelle, who now commanded the Kingdomes of Naples, and Sicilie; the Duchie of Millan, the Seigniorie of Tenn, the Countie of Asti, and other possessions in Italy, the whole Country of Germany, being the greatest part of Christendome, already either totally in his with Kildare.

I neither will nor intend to consent vnto the said Contract, or vnto the said Lady Katherine as my elipouill and wife, by any word, deede, act, or gesture to be spoken, done, performed, or acted by me, or in my name, by any whomsoever, whensoever, or howsoever for the time to come. In witness whereof I desire, require, cōtestre, and adize you all to giue testimonye hereunto.

By me Henry Prince of Wales.

The above written Protestation was read and made by the aforesaid Noble Prince Lord Henry, in the presence of the reverend Father and Lord in Christlike Lord Richard by divine permission Bishop of Winchester sitting iudicially in his Court; and I the Notary under-written, at that time present, the writer of his Acts in this behalfe appointed, and in the presence of the under-named witness for the years of our Lord God, 1505 the eight Indiction of the most holy See, of our father and Lord in Christ, by divine providence Pope I thus the second, in his second year, and 27. of the month of June, in which day the said worthy Prince was of perfect years of marriage, as then he did there affirm: in a certain outward Court within the wall Palace of Richmond, situate in the West-part of the said Palace: Concerning all and singular which things, the aforesaid most noble Prince instantly required and entreated me the aforesaid Notary to frame an instrument, and likewise the witness for underwritten to give testimonye. In satisfaction of all and singular the premises, the aforesaid Noble Prince hath subscribed his names and the witness for as aforesaid entreated and required have subscribed their names, with their own hands.

So it is as aboue said which I John Read doe witness by my hand and Seale.

The second protestation when he came to yeeres of marriage.

Notwithstanding this prescription foure yeeres after, and the first of his raigne, hee tooke the said Lady Katherine to wife; and without all exception enioied her nuptial society the space almost of twenty yeeres; in which time shee had borne him two sonnes, both of them in their infancy taken away by death, and one daughter Lady Mary growne now vnto tenne yeeres of age. But the scruple of Conscience increasing more tender in the Kings breaſt, he first refused the Queenes bed; and then mousing the doubt vnto his owne Diuines, sent for the opinions of the most Vniuersities in Europe, as to Paris, Orleans, Bourges, Amou, Padua, Tolous, Vincennes, Ausis, Ferrara, and others, which howsoever they then stood for the Pope, and hee allowing (by his Predecessors dispensation whose doing could not erre) the Maximisme lawfull, yet these Academics concluded against it, and signified the contrary vnder most of their common Seales as the relation of the Kings Agent imploied vpon the same purpose for that of Padua doth import, which writing vnder his owne hand I haue scene, and heere will insert his words, as followeth.

Please it your Highnesse to bee advertised, that at this day I obtained the Common Seale of the vniuersity of Padua in substantiall and good forme, for all the Doctors were assembled vpon Sunday, and the case was a-mongst them solemnly and earnestly disputed all Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, and this present Friday in the morning. And thereupon they concluded with your Highnesse, and desired a Notary to set his signe and hand vnto an instrument by Leuicams and Simonemus devised in Corroboration of your cause, and thereby to testify that this instrument was their deed, desire, act and conclusion. And more credite to be giuen to the said instrument they caused the Chancellor of the Vniuersitye here to set his hand and seale for the approbation of the Authority of the Notary: A Copy of all the which things I send vnto your Highnesse by this Bearer, in most humble wise beseeching the same to be advertised that the Generall of the Blacke Friers hath giuen commendement that no Blacke-friar dispute the Popes Power: Notwithstanding From Thomas Omibonus preaceth daily new superscriptions, and will doe till the briefe of contrary commendement shall come vnto his hands. My selfe thus bindeth me to advertise your Highnesse that all Lutherans bee utterly against your Highnesse in this cause, and hath leaped as much with their wretched poore souls without reason or authority, as they could and might, as well here as in Padua and Ferrara, where heere small company of them: I doubt not but all Christian Vniuersities if they bee well handled, will earnestly conclude with your Highnesse. And to obtaine their assent as well through Italie, France, Alicant, Austria, Hungary and Scotland, I think it marvellous expedient for the perfectment of this your most honorable and high cause.

At Venice the first of Iuly at night, Anno 50.

And in another letter dated from Prouer the xiii. of Iuly the said Ageot thus writeth, I haue procured vnto your Highnesse as appeareth by the Original being in my hand alone, the Subscriptions of an hundred Diuines, before the conclusion Collegij Theologorum Pacinorum, vnder their common Seale, whereof I haue sent your Highnesse a Copy, &c.

Now as touching their determinations, these are the abstractions taken out of larger discourses, whereof you may reade, if you please more in Holbois.

The decree of the Lawiers in the Vniuersity of Paris.

We the Deane and Colledge of the Vniuersity of Paris, after many disputations and reasons, made vpon both sides, turning and searching of Bookes, both by the Law of God, the Popes Law and the Civil Law, we say, that the Pope hath no Power to dispense in this case of Matrimony. Yeeres vnder the Seale of their faculty at Saint Iohn Lateranense in Paris, May 2. 1530.

The Iudgement of the Diuines in the Vniuersity of Paris.

The Deane and the faculty of holy Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Paris to all them to whom this present writing shall come, wisheth safety in Christ; For the Question proposed we came together in the Church of Saint Martin, and there for the same cause had a solempne Masse of the Holy Ghost, and vpon our owne determination, that the aforesaid Marriage with the Brothers wife departing without children is so forbad by the Lawes of God and Nature, that the Pope hath no power to dispense with such Marriage, whether they be contracted or to be contracted, to which this our assertion we haue caused the Seale of our faculty, with our Notaries signe to be put to this present writing. Dated in our General Congregation July 2. Anno 1530.

The determination of the Ciouilians of the Vniuersity of Anio.

After we the Doctors and Rector had discussed and examined many places aforesaid of the Law of God as of mans Law, vpon sufficient deliberation taken, we define and determine that neither by the Law of God nor of Nature, it is permitted for any Christian man, no act with the authority of the See Apostolike, or with any dispensation granted by the Pope to marry the wife that his brother hath left. In witness whereof we haue commanded the Scribe of our Vniuersity to signe this present publicke instrument with the great Seale of our said Vniuersity. Enacted

The Determination of the Vniversity of Burges.

We the Deane and facultie of Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Burges, after the example of Sanni Paul the Doctor of the Gentiles, begin with prayer to the quiting of the conference to whom this our writing shall come; the Question moued is whether the brother taking the wife of his dead brother, the marriage consummated, and perfect, be a thing lawfull or no. we by much labour and turning of Brakes, eury one of vs a part by himselfe, free from corruption, the better to obey the truth, finde it forbidden by the Leviticall law which is Gods, and that such marriage is an abominable defouering of his brothers flame, which cannot be allowed by the authority of any man; which our determination we haue caused to be signed with the seale of our faculty the tenth day of Iune, and yere of our Lord, 1530.

The opinions of the Diuines in the Vniuersity of Banny.

All wee Doctors of Diuinity in this Vniuersity, vnto whom this Question was propounded, whether it was for-bidden only by the Ordinance of the Church, or left by the Law of God, that a man might and marry the wife of his brother departed without children, and having examined the matter eury one of vs alone, lastly came alterge-ther, and as it were line by line, and rule by rule, brought forth their reasons for the contrary part, with those of the most Reverend Father Cardinall Casterne and of the disputation for raising up seed to his brother, spoken of in Deuteronomie; thus we determine, give iudgement, and say, and confidently doe hold and wintend that such marriage is horrible, execrable, and to be crined out oppen, and utterly abominable, not only for a Christian man but for an Infidel; unlawfull or heathen: and that it is prohibited consider greivous paines and punishments by the Law of God, of Nature, and of men, and that the Pope, though he may doe much, vnto whom Christ gave the keys of the Kingdome of Heauen, hath no power to a dispensation to ouer-come to contract such marriage: In witness whereof we confirm this our iudgement, both vnder the Seale of our Vniuersity, as also with the Seale of our Colledge of Doctors of Diuinity and haue subscribed it in the Cathedrall Church of Banny the tenth of Iune, the yere of our Lord, 1530.

The determination of the Vniuersity of Padua.

Seeing that certaine great Orators and Ambassadors did humbly require of vs, that wee would vouchsafe to search out with all diligence this question following, whether to marry the wife of our brother departed without children is forbidden only by the Law of the Church, or by the Law of God also: and if forbid by both the Lawes, whether the Pope may dispence with any man for such Matrimony or no? which Question we haue discussed and as farre as we can, haue made it cleere, both private eury man by himselfe and after altogether openly we say, iudge, decree, wintend, and for truth assure, that such marriage is no marriage: yea and that it is abhorred and cursed of eury Christian man, and to be abominable as a greivous sinne, and that it is cleerely forbidden vnder cruell penalty by the Lawes of nature, of God, and of men, and that the Pope vnto whom the keys of the Kingdome of Heauen are committed by Christ the Sonne of God, hath no power to dispense by the right of Law for any cause, suggestion, or excuse, that any such Matrimony should be contraited. In witness whereof we haue made this writing, and haue authorized it, with the accustomed Seale of our Vniuersity, dated at Padua in the Church of the Hieronimes of Saint Augustine the first of Iuly, and yere of our Lord, 1530.

The determination of the Vniuersity of Tholouze.

It was treated in our Vniuersity of Tholouze: whether it were lawfull for a brother to marry her which had beene wife to his brother now departed, and without children: as also whether the Pope might bath the cure of Christi flocke allowing it by his dispensation, it be lawfull therefore which, the best Doctors of Diuinity, and the Law, did sweare that they would obey the sacred Canons sets, and would follow the holy Decrees of the Fathers, and falling to conclusion stuck fast upon this point, that it is lawfull for no man, neither by the Law of God, nor by the Law of nature, to take her to wife to his brother bath left: neither can the Pope dispence with this Law of God, as touching the commandment in Deuteronomie that the brother should marry his wife to raise up seed vnto him, that his name should not perish among the Tribes of Israel, we answered that that Law was but a shadow and figure of things to come, which vanished away as soon as the substance of the Gospell appeared. Thus haue we given our sentence, which wee haue signed with our Antient Seale of this Vniuersity. Tenues at Tholouze, the Calends or first day of October, the yere of our Lord, 1530.

These and many more were read by the Lord Chancellor vnto the lower house of Parliament that they might report in their countries; the Kings iust cause of disorde. To forward which (as was thought) Cardinall Wolsey the said Lord Chancellor was sent Ambassadour into France, laden with Crownes, as Guichebardin faith, and with surpassing Pompe as London behelde, who with good Horie passed the Bridge toward Dener, and so into France.

But rumors in England full spreading of the good Queens disorde about a yere after, K. Henry to satis-fie all sent for his Nobles, his Councellers, Iudges, and many wise Commoners vnto whom he made a most pithy Oration, shewing them with what care he had ruled almost twenty yeres with honour and victory, which as he said, would shortly be clouded, if he should die and leave them a litigious Heire, example he shewed of the wooll experience of Leuegher and Zerk, in whose dissenti-ons the Realme was like to haue beene vterly destroyed; and although (saith he) we haue a daughter to the great comfort of her mother and me, yet it is told vs by great Clearkes, our marriage is not lawfull, but that the stande in case of illegitima-tion; and we both, afraid to lye in abominable Adultery; I thinke you (my Lords) that these words doe not touch my very soule, the perill whereof we venture, as you doe also your inheritance, for which cause I haue asked counsell of the greatest Clearkes in Christendome, and haue likewise heard the opinion of mine owne. But as touching the Queene, if it bee iudged by the Law of God that she is my lawfull wife, there shall be nothing more acceptable vnto mee, whose noble conditions, I assure you, (besides her great Parentage) is most gentle, louing and obedient; whereof I haue had a true experience almost these twenty yeres: and were I to choise a wife (if the marriage might stand with Gods Law) my Choise should be of her, before any other woman in the world, and if it shall otherwise be proued, I shall not onely be most sorrowfull for parting with so louing a companion, but much more haue occasion to lament my chance and life in so foule a sin; these then are the sores that torment my minde, for the losing of my soule, and for which cause I haue heere assembled you, that you may declare to our louing Subjects this our true meaning, and to stay if it may be the rumors of vnfaired reports; and this being said, he let them to depart, each man bewraying in countenance the affection of his mind, some pitying the King to fee him so perplexed, some fauouring the Queene forwarde her case, and some fighged

fighed deeply at this strange speech and sudden alteration.

(68) But the Cardinal of Turke fearefull to wade too farre alone in this troubled waters, desired the assistance of the learned in the Realme, and thereto got the Kings licence, which with his Legatine authority, commanded many learned men both Divines & Lawyers, from Oxford and Cambridge, with the presence of many Bishoppes besides. These assembled at London, were shewed the Instruments and Seales of many foraine universities, all of them disallowing the marriage, and holding the dispensation (allowing it) unlawfull: but because that King could not bee touched without sound of reproch to the Pope, as also to clear the King from calumnious reports; it was thought fittest to send the said Instruments to Rome, whereunto theie so appointed for their owne seales, with a humble request to his Holinesse, that an indifferent Iudge might be sent thence, to determine this great and strange cause of the King; which was so followed by his Ambassadors in the Pope Court, that Laurance Campian a Cardinal of great credite and wisdom, from their Consistory was sent into England, vnto whom, Willelmy Cardinal of Turke was ioined in commission, with power to erect a Court, to heare the cause pleaded, & to give sentence definitive, as they found the equity of law.

(69) To that end therefore a place was ordained at the Blacke-fryers in London and the King with the Queene removed themselves vnto his palace of Brickwell nere adioining, whence ere long they were summoned by Proccelle personally to appeare in Court, which accordingly they did, having funeralle seates ordained vnder clothes of estate, mounted somewhat higher then the two Cardinals, the Presidents, vnder whose feet sat the Scribes and other Officers; the Court being framed Consistory-wise, was furnished with Bishoppes, Doctors, Lawyers, and learned Counsellors, in most solemne wise: the Doctors for the King, were Simpson and Bell, and his Proctors Peter and Tregonell; for the Queene were Fisher, Standish, and Ridley, a very little man but a great Diuine, the Court thus set, and Commission read, the Crier called the King, by the name of King Henry to come into the Court, who forthwith answered and said, Here. Then was the Queene called by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court, who made no answer at all, but presently rose vp, and going about the Court to the King, fell down on her knees before his feet, and in the hearing of the people spake thus in effect.

"Sir, I desire you to take some pity vpon mee, and doe mee Iustice and Right: I am a poore woman, a stranger borne out of your Dominions, hauing here no indifferent Councell, and lesse assurance of friendship. Alas, wherein haue I offended, or what cause of displeasure haue I given, that you intend thus to put mee away? I take God to my Iudge, I haue bene to you a true and humble wife, ever conformable to your will and pleasure, neuer gaine-saying any thing wherein you tooke delight, without all grudge or discontented countenance; I haue loved all them that loved you, howeuer their affections haue bene to mee ward, I haue borne you children, and bin your wife now this twenty yeeres, of my virginity and marriage bed, I make God and your own conscience the Iudge, and if it otherwise bee proved, I am content to bee put from you with shame. The King your Father in his time for wisdom was knowne to bee a second Salomon, and Ferdinando of Spain my Father, accounted the wisest among their Kings; could they in this match bee so farre offencere, or are there now wiser and more learned men, then at that time were? Surely, it seemeth wonderfull to mee that my marriage after twenty yeeres should bee thus called in question with new inuention against me "who neuer intended but honestly. Alas, Sir, I see I am wronged, hauing no Councill to speake for me, but such as are your Subiects, and cannot bee indifferent vpon my part. Therefore I most humbly beseech you, euen in Charity to say this course, vntill I may haue aduise and counsel from Spain; if not, your Graces pleasure be done. And therewithall rising, and making lowly obeysance to the King, departed thence, leaning vpon the Arme of her receiuer, each man expecting thee had returned to her seat, when as she tooke directiue out of the place, which being perceiued, the Crier againe called her by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court; Madam quoth her guide, you are againe called, on, on, said shee, it maketh no matter, this is no indifferent Court for mee, therefore goe forward.

(70) The King perceiving that she was departed, presently spake thus vnto the assembly. "I will (quoth hee) in her absence declare before you, I, that she hath bene to mee a most true, obedient and comfortable wife, endured with all vertuous qualities and conditions, according to her birth; and in lowlinesse equals any of baier estate. With that Cardinal Willy made vnto the King an humble request, that his Maiesty would bee pleased to declare before that honourable audience, whether hee had bene the cause of this his intended dishonour, wherewith hee was charged in the opinions of the people.

"My Lord Cardinal quoth the King, I can well excuse you in this, and rather asseure that you haue bene against mee, in attempting it thus far; but the chiefest motive for this matter, was the scruple of conscience, conceived vpon certaine words spoken by the Bishop of Bayne, the French Ambassador, sent from the King to conclude a marriage betwixt Prince Henry his second sonne, Duke of Orleanes, and our onely daughter Lady Mary, which Bishoppe made doubt, and desired respite to be satisfied for the legitimacion of our said daughter, in respect of our marriage with this woman, being my owne brothers wife, which presently engendered such scruples and doubts in mee, that my conscience hath bene continually vexed, lest by continuing in that saine after knowledge, I draw Gods indignacion against mee, which I feare wee haue already done in that he hath sent vs no Issue male, and them that were begot in this nuptiall bed, no sooner came into the world, but were taken againe thence, and hopelesse now of more issue by her, it behoueth me to consider the state of this Realme, and the danger that may follow for lacke of a lawfull Prince to succeed. This burden too weighty for my weakke conscience (not in any dislike of the Queenes age, or person, with whom I desire onely to continue, if our marriage may stand with the law of God) I haue in this place assembled vnto our grace Prelates, and learned Diuines, to determine of, and will God willing submit my selfe to your Iudgements. My doubts in this case I moned in confession to you my Lord of Lincolne, and ghostly father, whereof your selfe being somewhat troubled, said you would aske counsell of you all my Lords. Then of you my Lord of Canterbury being Metropolitan, I got licence to put the matter in question, to which I grant you all put your seales, as here in this Court the same is to bee done. True it is, said the Lord of Canterbury, and I doubt not but that all my brethren here present will acknowledge the same. Not so my Lord said the Bishoppe of Beche, your neuer had my hand to that Instrument, nor neuer shall. Indeed said Canterbury you did it not your selfe, but admitted mee to subscribe your name, and allowed mee your Seale; vnder your correction said Beche, that is not so; Well, well, (quoth the King) you are but one man, against whom at this time we will not dispute, and so rose vp, and the Court adioined vntill another day. Which was vpon the next following, and twenty of May, the two Cardinals being let, the Lawyers were ready vpon either parts.

Against the lawfulness of the marriage was allead-ged the other formerly solemnized with Prince Arthur, the Kings elder brother, and the special knowledge of Lady Katherine's body, which was vehemently proleated by the Kings learned Council, by many reasons and likelihood of truth: one was, that Prince Henry had bene deferred from creation and title of Prince of Wales, the space of fixe monethes after Arthurs decease, as doubtfull whether Lady Katherine had bene by him concieued with child; for which cause as was alleadged the said Lady had procured a second Bull from the Pope, with this tuleration, vel forsan cognitam, et personarum carnally knowne: which Bull was onely purchased to dispence with this marriage. Thus the carnally knowe, was vrged the report of his Chamberlaine, vpon certain wordes spoken by Prince Arthur the first morning that hee rose from her bed.

(71) The Negatives denied all the presumptions, and this last, too farre vnto the contrary that reuerent assembly and honorable Court. But by these Au-thenticall Records which M. Fox had in his custody, the matter is past all contradiction for her carnall knowledge, where it is affirmed that the Ambassadors of Ferdinand, being in England to see the same marriage consummated, returned their knowledge of their mutual coniunction, as that nothing was left vpperformed of any natiual right, and they being of yeeres able to explete the Act, hee about fifteen, and shee about seenteene, liued both in one bed almost five monethes together, doe assure the certainty of that, which they made their greatest doubt, vntill the Papes dispensation was a Core to the cause. But that shee was carnally knowne the Vniuersity of Padua had concluded in their sentence, whom the Emperors Ambassadors carnally solicited, either to retract their said grant, or to give forth a new sentence vpon the case that the Queene was not carnaliter cognita ab illiusdem Prin-cipe Arthuro, or to determine that this Matrimony was not deridendum, which in no wise they could obtaine though they offered very largely to haue it done. Thus from day to day the pleas proceeded, but nothing concluded touching the disoore; where-vpon the King sent the two Cardinals to perswade with the Queene to put the whole matter onely to himselfe, which would bee farre better, and more honourable for her, then to stand to the tryall of law.

(72) These Legates accordingly repaired to Bridewell, and in presence staied for the Queene, who presently from among her maides at worke came forth vnto them, hauing a skene of white therade about her necke, at whose sight the said, alacke my Lords, I am very sorry to make you attend vpon me; what is your will? ife please your Grace (quoth Cardinal Wolsey) to go into your priuy Chamber, we will deliuer the cause of our coming: my Lord (quoth she) this place is most fit, I pray you therefore declare here your minds. With that hee began his speech in Latine which she presently interrupted, saying, that shee vnderstoode the English very well.

(73) Madam (quoth the Cardinal) wee are come in good will, to know your Graces mind, in this great matter of your marriage, and to giue you our aduise with the best seruice wee can. My Lords (said she) I thank you, but for answer of my resolution, I cannot so suddenly make the cause is great, and toucheth mee very neere; I am here a stranger, a poore woman lacking witte, not able to answer such noble and wise personages as yee be, I haue need of counsell, and they be in Spain; for thinke you my Lords, that any English subjects, will bee for me against the King? forsooth I know

"they will not, I pray your Lordships be good vnto me, a forrainger and destitute of friends, and aduise mee with your Counsell, which I will bee glad to heare. And thereupon taking them by the hands, led them into her Chamber, where they staid somewhat long, which done they departed, and made relation of her answer vnto the King. Who nothing pleased at the answer shee made them, first againe certain Lords vnto her, to shew her the determinations of those Christian Vniuersities, who had prescribed the marriage vnlawfull, and to wish her to remit the matter for the quieting of the kings conscience vnto foure Prelates, and foure temporall Lords: vnto whom shee answered saying, "the King my Father which concluded my marriage, I am sure was not so ignorant, but he asked counsell of Clerkes and well learned men, before hee married me the second time: for if he had had any doubt in my marriage, hee would haue doubted in great treacheries hee did, and then all the Doctors agreed my marriage to be good: in so much that the Pope himselfe, which knew best what was to be done, did both dispense and ratifie the second ma-riage, against whose doings I maruaile that any person will speake or write. But as touching the determinations of the Vniuersities, I am a woman and lacke witte and learning to answer to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue done fully or partially: for this I am sure, that neither the Kings father, nor my father would haue condempned our marriage, if it had bene declared to bee vnlawfull: and where you say, I should put the cause to eight persons of this Realme for quietness of the Kings conscience, I pray God send his Grace a quiet conscience: and this shall bee your answer, that I say I am his lawfull wife, and to him lawfully married, and by the order of the holy Church, I was to him espoused as his true wife (although I was so worthy and in that point I will abide till the Court of Rome which was priuy to the beginning, haue made cher-of a determination and final end.

(74) The King then hopefull of his Queenes consent hastned his Lawyers to forward their disoore, which daily they did, and the Confistory at Black-Friars daily frequented, all points in Law were opened to the full, so that nothing now remained but the sentence of the Iudges: for which a solemn day was assigned when the King in person came to heare it himselfe. His seat taken, and the Court set, after a Erie for silence the proceedings were openly read, and all doubts cleared, the learned Counsell at Barre called for Iudgement, whereunto Campeius the Papes floure Champlion, vpon his blisse gourly legges stood vp, all men expecting the sentence of Disoore, but the Cardinal now not to leaue what hee had furmerly determined, said flatly, I will not giue iudge-ment in this matter, too high for vs, considering the effects of the Persons, and the doubtfullnesse of the occasions alleged, vntill I haue made a full relation to the Papes holiness of all our procedings, whose counsell and commandement in this case I will obserue and follow, vnder whose authority we sit and are commissioners, therefore I will adiourne the Court for this time according to the order of the Court of Rome from whence our irremissible iurisdiction is deriued. Which how it displeased the King, the Sequell will shew, and how then taken the words of the Duke of Suffolke did wel declare, who stepping forth with a firme countenance vfed these words, It was neuer merry in England since we haue had any Cardinals among vs.

The lodgement thus staied, the King sent his Secretary Stephen Gardiner to Rome, to follow that

The cause of gratitude against

the Cardinall.

Chairs searched at Calixtus, eaten to the Chokes and Males. The cause of this Stay (saith Stileman) was, that the French King, an entire friend unto Rome, had no better sincere in Naples, against the Emperour, whom the Pope durst not dislike, the Lady Katherine being his Aunt, for whom the Emperour was so earnest, as in her behalfe he laboured Millions and many other places, that their learned men should not determine against the said Queene. But whatsoever the cause was, that Campanio denied his sentence for the Diocese, certain it is, that Cardinall Wolsey, fell likewise in great displeasure of the King, though hee sought to excuse himselfe with want of sufficient authority: but now his Sonne having passed the Mendian of his greatness, began by degrees againe to decline, till lastly it let vnder the cloud of his fatalle eclipse.

(71) Formerly we have spoken of the rising of this man, who now being swolne so bigge by the blasts of promotion, as the bladder not able to containe more greatness, suddenly burst, and vented forth the wind of all former favours. Vaine glorious he was, in state in diet, and in rich furniture for house, and in prodigall intertainments, more like to a Prince than a Prelate, attended with so many officers, and seruants as is almost incredible, were not his Check-roll yet to be seene. At his masse he was served by Dukes, and Earles, who took the affaie of his wine on their knees, and held him his Balen at the Lauatorie. And being Ambassador vnto the Emperour at Brussels, was there waited vpon by many noble men of England, and seated at Table by his seruitors vpon their knees, to the great admiration of the Germanes which beheld it: and indeed so much oerstopped the Pompe of a spirituall function, as hee seemed to the more humble, to be mad for ioy, and him doth Campanio iudge, rather to be a Ballard of some Prince, then the sonne of a Burgher, so moulded for the one, and so farre mounting from the other: exceedingly wife he was and very well spoken, but full of reuenge and vicious of body, thrall to affection, and lulled asleepe with flattery, miserable to get, but princely in bestowing, loy to his enemies, and neuertheles reconciled, which hastened his fall, when he first began for to slippe. Queene Katherine in her castle, did graciously accuse him, the Counsell for their parts, did arise against him, the Law found him to be a premanie vnto the King, and St. Thomas Moore in the high Court of Parliament inueighed bitterly against him.

(72) The first steppe of his descent was his dislike of the Kings affection vnto Anne Bullen, a Gentlewoman nothing fauourable to his Pontificall Pompe, nor no good follower of the Rites of those times, which moued the Cardinall (the Pope having affirmed the sentence of Queene Katherine's cause vnto himselfe) to write vnto his holinesse to deferre the iudgement of Diocese, till he had wrought the Kings mind in another mould. This was not done so secretly, but that it came to the Kings eare, and lastly cost the proud Cardinall his life. For the broad Scale first taken from him, and his other Bishopricks elsewhere bestowed, his House and furniture leased vpon, and himselfe removed into the North, at Caesars Castle fuen miles from York, was suddenly arreſted (for arrogant words importing a desire of reuengement, saith Stileman) by the Earle of Northumberland, whence he was conuoyed toward London by the Lieutenant of the Tower, in which iourney at Leicester Abbey he ended his life, whose death himselfe had hastened by taking an ouermuch quantity of a confection to bracke wine from off his stomacke, and in that Church was there entured.

(77) The grudges against this Cardinall were many and great, not onely for the especial fauour he stood in with the King, and great stroke he bare at Counsell Board, (both which commonly breed emulation vnto the man so elevated) but for his intolerable pillings, who to patch vp his pride in the raising of his new Colledges, erected at Oxford and Windsor, by the licence of Pope Clement 7. suppressed some Monasteries of good fame, and bountifull Hospitallitie, converting all their goods and mouables into his owne Colers; which were so stuffed with treasure, that twelue Barrels full of gold and silver were laid aside, so farre the Pope in his warres. As also that he emptied the Land of twelue score thousand pound, enforced by him from the King: All which he converted to relieve, and ransom the Pope then in Prison, to the great impoverishing of his Mairties Coffers. That his owne reuenues by his faculties, licences, and other legitimate exactions did equalize the Kings yearly Reuenues, and lastly his pride so intolerable, as no lesse then twelue hundred horie for his retinue, fourscore Wagons for his carriage, and threecore Males for sumpter-horſes attended him into France. But ſeu traſti gloria mundi, and the highest Boud is subiect to an ebbe.

(78) But whilst the matter of the Kings marriage hung thus in suspense the space of two yeeres, and other Ambassadors intended to bee sent vnto Rome: it chanced Doctor Cramer, Doctor Stephens, and Doctor Fox to meet at Walham at one Table, where the two last, great Agents for the King, fell in discourse of his cause by termes, and strength of the Ciail Law. Well said Doctor Cramer, if might be heard, I thinke much better it might be tried by Gods Law: whereby the King should bee firstelected in the case of his Conscience, then thus to be posſed off with delays from yeere to yeere. This speech Doctor Fox made known to his Maieſtie, which founded very tannably in his eare, then was Cramer sent for, conferred with by the King, and commanded to write his minde in the matter, but with this caution prefixed, not to respect the persons but the cause; who to him commended the veruous perfections of his Queene, with whom about all others he most desired to continue, if Gods marriage could bee made warrantable by Cow Lawes: to which end he commended the care of Bookes, and of his other Prouisions vnto the Earle of Wiltſhire at Darken Place. The Doctor thus firste on worke, when he least looked to be so imploied, proued by Scriptures, General Councils, Auncient Writers, besides the present, and his owne opinion, that the Bishop of Rome had no authority to dispense with the word of God, nor the Scriptures.

(79) The treatise thus finished, he presented it to the King, which when he had well read, and weighed the substance therein concerned; Will you (quoth he) Master Doctor abide by what you haue writ? that will I by Gods grace find Cramer, euen before the Pope himselfe, if you Maieſty will so assigne it; Marry quoth the King to him shall you goe. Whereupon Thomas Bullen Earle of Wiltſhire, Doctor Stokesley, Elſt of London, Doctor Leetie the King's Almoner, the Doctors Craut, Brower, and Cramer, were sent to the Pope then at Rome in Italy. The day approached for audience of their Ambosſſage, and the high Prelate sat vpon his Throne of Elate, the Doctor prepared to make his Oration in defence of what he had writ, when on the ſoudaine he was interrupted by an vnmannely spurrill of the Earles, who seeing the Pope put forth his foot to be kist, caught in his teeth the Pontificall great Toe, so that these Ambassadors disdainig to kisse where the dogge had taken an assly, let the Pope draw backe his foot, and so lost that especial fauour offered vnto them. The Proposition then made, that no man here durſe could or ought to marry his brothers wife, and that the Bishop of Rome by no means could dispence to the contrary, was replied vnto, that it should be answered at more leisure, when his holinesse returned to Rome; in the meane while, so grace Cramer the more, he gratified him with the office of the Penitentiarius, and so dismissed the Ambassadors: who all, being Cramer returned ned to England, but he took his way towards the Emperour (to whom the cause somewhat appeained being then at Vienna in his expedition against the Turke, vnto whose learned men he offered disputation, and in private conference to satiate Cornelius Agrippa, the most respected for learning in the Emperours Court, as he held the Proposition most true. Whereupon others learned were discouraged to dispute, and suffered Cramer to depart without a ny further proceedings.

(30) The matter thus manifested in most parts of Christendome, this Gerardus knote was fully vntolced by King Henric himselfe, who now breides this his marriage, beganne to call in question, where as thorie the Pope had in his dominions, which being afterwards debated in Parliament, an Act passed against his vltured Hierarchy, and all persons forbidden to appeale, or to make any paymentes vnto Rome. The Kings marriage with Lady Katherine, was by the same Parliament dissolved, and his separation from her, made by the Archbishop of Canterburie to stand good, and effectiual by Law, and that Queene Katherine from thenceforth should be called Princesse Dowager, which doinge she took too hart, as shee procured the Popes curse against King Henric, and his Realme, which curse was set vpon Dawbergh in Flanders, for that the bringer thereof durst come no neerer. And the Pope in renenge of himselfe, beinge let in his Conсылу accompanied with his Cardinals, proceeded to the Censure of these great Princes marriage, which he then adjudged to stand most firme and Canonically, and enioyned King Henric to hold matrimoniall society with the King Katherine his lawful wife and Queen, and in that estate to account and maintaine her as it became a King and loving husband to doe, and if he refused to accomplish these premises then to be compelled thereunto, and neuer after to be heard in any Court as touching the invaliditie of the said marriage, and to pay the expences of the said trauele, as he the holy father should limit and thinke meete. This was done a yere after that the King had married Queen Anne, and bare date from Rome, the 23. of March and yere of Crisp 1534. For in the meane while King Henry had set his affection vpon the Lady Anne Bullen, a Phenix indeed in his Princely eye, and another Hesper for Englands saluation, both in herselfe and royall Bod succeeding, as the heauens and world doe witness to this day. Shee was the daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen Viscount Beaufort, Earle of Wiltshire, and of Lady Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk. This Earle Thomas her father was the sonne of Sir William Bullen whose wife was Lady Margaret, the second daughter and Coheire of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormond, and the said Sir William was the sonne of Sir Godfrey Bullen Lord Mayor of London, who lieth buried in Saint Laurence Church in the lewie, pictured in his winding sheete vpon a Plate of Brasse, and about his Grave-stone vpon a border of brasse in many places these words are written. New time, New time, New time, whose Charity was extended vpon the poore householders of this Citie, in distributing among them a thousand pounds. His Lady was Anne, eldest daughter and Coheire vnto Thomas Lord Hoo and Hoyling, and his descent out of the house of the Bullens, an ancient Family in the Countie of Norfolke; accused therefore to be pen, that slanderously bringeth this role from a defiled Bed, whose Serpents mouth to vphold his God the Pope, hath spewed out his poison of vntuthes, and made his tongue a sharpe sword against the Lords annointed; let him therefore recieue his portion with the Serpent of deceit, and his reward with Satan the father of lies.

time.

(3a) Here, the King innelted Marchionesse of Fremboke with Mantle and Coronet, both in regrade of her Nobilitie and many vertues (for Iorinne the wurdres of her Patens) who done he tookte the feare, for France, accompanied with such a traine of his Nobles, as the like had not been seene, and amongst many Ladies Anne Tudor was one, where hee complained to the French King of the great wrongs offered him by the dull Pope as hee called him, who would have Kings in perfon to attend his leasure at Rome, and contrary to their Kingly dignities, to expose themselves and Affairs at his will there, to bondage and great dangers; and therefore he earnestly requested that the Pope might bee summoned to a Conncell, to answer the many abuses that hee had offered unto most of the Princes in Christendome, and unto himselfe not the least; who for his part had allowed him threecore thousand Angels monetly to maintain an Army for the use of his defence out of the Castle of Angeli, where the Emperials vnder the Prince of Orange kept him. Which his businesse being ended in France, and the King againe returned into England, he presently (through privacy) married the said Lady Marchionesse in his Cloiset at White-hall, in the presence of many, the Lady Anne Savage bearing her Train, and Doctor Lee doing the rites of their conjunction, who was afterwards consecrated Bishop of Chesler, Conuener; and Lucifild, and Prebende of Wales.

(31.) The Romanists much fearing that Rabel would discover, if Queene Anne might be heard against wicked Haman, sought to vnderpropper the foundations thereof, with certaine deuices of their owne; and that the same might passe without note of suphicion, they laide their forgerie enen from Heauen it selfe; they whole pretended Oracle Eusebius Barpes (commonly called, the holy made of Kent) was made to be; and the pillars of this godlesse Fabrick were Edward Becking, a Monke by profession, and doctor of Diuinity, Richard Mayes, Parson of Aildington, the Town wherein he dwelt, Richard Deering a Monke, Hayb Rich a Prier, Iohn Adfleson, and Thomas Alford, Priests, put by their helping hands, and Henrie Gould Bachelor of Diuinity, with Iohn Elfeur the Ruersted father of Rochester, imployed their paines to daube thei downe-falling walls, with their vntempered Morter. The Scribes that their pens for her Miracles, were Edward Thwaites Gentleman, and Thomas Laurence Rectiour, besides Hankford a Monke who wrote a letter that was forged to be sent her from Heauen; and Richard Ridsley and Thomas Gould, were the men which dispersed her Miracles abroad to the world. This holy made Eusebius made a Vozarife in Canterbury, was taught by Becking her Gholly Father, and suspected Paramour, to counterfeit many figned trances, and in the same to viter many vertuous words for therebroke of sinne, vnder which, more freely there was heard against Luthers doctrine, and the Scriptures translation, then desired of many: neither so only, but that there came forth from God, and his Saints, by fuddery fugglesine Revelations; that if the King proceeded in his dinorice, and second marriage, he should not raigne in his Realme one month after, norre in Gods fauour the space of an houre. But the truth discouered by Gods true Ministers, that Oracle gave place as all other chind did, when Christ by his death stoppeth their lying mouths: for herselfe and seven of her Disciples were executed for Treason at Tiborne, and the other five put to their shames and imprisonment. With the like counterfeit reuelations and fained predictions this Generation of Hypocrites had brought Edward Lord Stafford, Duke of Bachingham vnto his vnhappy end, when as by the working of Iohn de la Court, his own Confessor together with Nicholas Bacon a Monke of the Carthusian Order, in the Priore of Henricus in Somersetshire, who by his visions from heaven foretold, heartened him for the Crowne; but before his owne Coronet could aspire to that ropp, hee worthily lost both head and all vpon Tower-hill for his treason, Ann. Dom. 1521. Vnto such sinners the world was then subiect, and into such conceites their repented holines had brought them, not onely among the simple and vnderbred, but euen with them that seemed to bee learned indeed: for by certaine predictions foretelling a great deluge, Prior Balton of Saint Bartholomew in London was so fearful, that hee built him a house vpon the height of Willesden hill, storing it with provisions necessary, to keepe him selfe from drowning, in A. D. 1524.

(84) But the Popes Holinesse fearing the euent of the game, if euer any man might set and cast at his Crowne, thought it high time to lay hand on his owne State, and to keepe what was left, lest it would bee gone; to which end hee solicited many Christian Princes to stand on his part, and among them sent his Brief vnto James the first King of Scotland, desiring his assistance against King Henry of England, whom in his Confinity hee had pronounced to bee an Heretike, a Schismaticke, a manifest Adulterer, a publicke murderer, a committer of Sacrilege, a Rebelle, and consist of Lesse Majesties, for that hee had risen against him who was his Lord. And therefore hee had wilfully deprived him of his said Kingdom, and would dispose the same to him and other Princes: so as they would assist to recouer the same, a very good provision, and very well foreseen; for notwithstanding these boisterous blasts from Rome, the King kept his Crowne, and was rather feared of the Popes best Abettors, then did feare any potent power that the world could afford, whose thoughts were now busied for the Coronation of his Queen.

(85) For Queen Anne conceived, and perceived with Child, her royall Coronation was forthwith prepared, which with all royall obseruances vpon the first of June, being Whituesday was performed; and the twentieth of September following, shee bare into the world that excellent Princeesse, which afterwards proved the mirror of the world, euen Lady ELIZABETH, your late and most famous Queene.

(86) True it is, that the zealous conseruation of this godly Queene gave great encouragements vnto many, more publicly with boldnes to professe the Gospel, so that the Ministers formerly fled in case of Religion, returned againe into England, where the new Testament (translated by Tyndall) was read, but with such dislikes to the Bishoppes, that they got it to be burnt. Notwithstanding, to tickle the Kings eare, they preached against the Popes supremacy, and took the oath for the King themselves; abolished his authority by Act of Parliamt, and suppressed many Monasteries; leaving their reuenues to the Kings will; faire introductions indeed for what they intended, as the sequell of the sixe Articles by them procured, doth manifestly shew: and those purpously made against the maintainers of the Gospel, wherof Queen Anne was the chiefe, who first was most fauourable to those learned Divines, that laide mans saluation vpon the Rocke Christ, next in procuring a tolleration from the king for them, whose doctrine did daily vndermine the Papall foundations; & lastly, shee by no means would consent to marry the King, vntill a lawfull divorce was had for his separation from Lady Katharine, his brother Arthurs wife, which thing this Pope greatly withstood: these were causes sufficient to moue his Holinesse to bend his brow, and by his fortraments in Court to cutte off the principal mouer, who foresawing no time tooke the Ball before his rebound.

(87) For the Queene delivered of a dead Child, and the Kings affection wandering elsewhere, gave them occasion to worke on that Subiect, which God in his wisdom would haue downe, lest his deliuerance from the bondage of darknesse should be attributed to any fleshly arme, or that hee who then sat in the throne of the worlds full felicity, should fixe her senses on so tickle a Center, who hauing had experience what it was to bee a Prince, must henceforth practise the patience of a poore prisoner, which in the third yeere of her marriage, and second of May, to act the wofull Scene of her Tragedy, shee came vpon the Stage, being sent to the Tower of London, and charged with high Treason against the King: at whose first entrance shee fell on her knees before Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolke; and Thomas Cromwell Secretary her bringers, desiring God so to helpe her as she was guiltlesse of those things wherof shee was accused, beseeching those Lords to bee Petitioners vnto his Maieity in her behalfe, who lamenting her case, lesser Prisoner with Sir William Kingston Constable of the place.

(88) I will in no wise excuse her guilt, hauing had iudgement and death by law through others, and that vpon iust occasions before mee haue done, but will speake from them what they haue said, and namely one, that wrote thereof vnto a worthy and reuerent person in whose defence his wordes are these: *It seemeth very plaine, that the crimes supposed against this Christian Queene Anne, were matters contriued by the deuise of the Pope, and his Instruments her enemies. None of them all that were accused in the same Treason, confessing the Actions vnto death, but haue left direct Testimonies in writing to the contrary: one means Graeme excepted, namely Mr. Arthur Smeton, made confession vpon some promise of life belike, but had his head cutt off before hee was aware or had time to recall what hee had said. The like did Cromwell the Secretary signify to the King, after the prisoners had bene thoroughly examined in the Tower by the Councill, who wrote thus in his letter on the same day: many things haue bene objected, but nothing confessed, onely some circumstances haue bene acknowledged by Marke. And so Mr. Crammer Archbishop of Canterbury in his letter of comfort vnto the King, who fore lamented that such a fiere was fallen, if her guilt could bee proved, and willed his Highnesse to stand in defence of the Gospel as shee had done, without any report of confessing or acknowledging any such Acts as were objected, which as Smeton writeth, were Adultery, and incest, but vniuilly (saith he) as it is supposed and proved false: With her were executed certaine Gentlemen of the Kings Priuie Chamber, namely, Norris, Weston, Breton, and one Marks, whose contrary to her conscience (as it is reported) for hope of preferment subscribed to a bill, whereby shee was condemned both by herselfe and all the rest.*

(89) For vpon the fourteenth of May, her brother George Bullen Lord Rochford, for his supposed offence with these foure before named, were all of them beheaded vpon the Tower hill, but none of them counselling the Action; I haue heard it reported that Rochford the Queenes brother coming to her bed side to sollicite a fauour, leane thereupon to whisper her in the eare which the Spies gaue forth that hee did so, to kisse the Queen, how soeuer, they are dead, and the Queene must die, who two dayes before had bene arraigned in the Tower, the Duke of Norfolke being her Iudge, to her indictment shee answered so effectually, that shee seemed to cleare all matters laid to her charge; yet was shee found guilty, and vpon the nineteenth day of May, was brought to a Scaffold erected on the Greene within the said Tower, where, in presence of many noble men, the Lord Mayor of London, the Shireffs, and some principall commons, there is said to haue spoken these words in their presence.

(90) Good Christian people, I am come hither to die, for according to the Law, and by the Law I am iudged to death, and therefore I will speake nothing against it; I come hither to accuse no Arthur Graeme, Queen Anne's search at her death.

"man, nor to speake any thing of that whereof I am accused and condemned, as for mine owne offences God knoweth them, and vnto God I remitte them, beseeching him to haue mercy vpon my soules: and if any person will meddle in my cause, I desire them to iudge the best, and so I take my leau of the world, and of you all, and heartily do beseech you to pray for mee; and I beseech Iesus saue my Soueraigne and Master the King, the most godliest, nobilit, and gentlest Prince, that is Jong to raunge ouer you. These words she vttered with a smiling countenance, which done, shee kneeled down, and with a feruent Spirit said, to Iesus Christ I commend my soule, Lord Iesus receive my soules and repeating those words very often, suddainly the stroke of the sword sealed the debt that she owed vnto death, whose head and body was buried in the quiet of the Chappell in the Tower.

(91) Now that her death was rather sought for, than any wife desired, doth witness the sword, whose edge was not waped from the blood of her death, before the marriage bed of the King was prepared for another wife, which was Lady Jane Seymour in vertues her equally: who vpon the next day following betwixt the twentieth of May, was married vnto the King, and succeeded this unfortunate Lady in place of his Reverie.

(92) And albeit Queene Anne in her lifetime had sinned as David; or by frailty fell, as who sinneth not; yet that it should be so licentious and vnnatural, the quiet of her conscience at her death, did well witness the contrary, & her innocency so much more apparent, as her Christian modesty, in excusing her Soueraigne, and yielding obedience to the law how-soever Paul and Paulus testus from their Cardinals splenities have filled their pennies to blot her faire name, whose death now standing was so grieuou-sly taken among the German Protestant Princes, who were minded to haue made K. Henry the head of their league, that thereupon they vicerly brake off, and related him, only for the cause and death of this most Christian Lady, whose religion and vertues daily shewed forth the fruits of her life, both in preferring the best men of his vnto the best be-nefices, and also retaining for her Chaplains them of good fame, whose godly exhortations shee did not only follow, but would will them freely to tell her what they saw in her amiss. So merciful shee was to the poore, that shee spent almost her whole treasure for their reliefe, and in nine months space distributed among them to the value of fifteen thousand pounds, intending likewise to beflow a great stocke into the foure quarters of the Realme, to set poore Artificers on worke. Now if the tree bee known by the fruits, as truly it is, then these were her lights that shined before men, and the works that shewed the fruites of her faith farre from such finnes, as the say of those times charged her with.

(93) And by the working of the same faith, her penitency was seene, in her sorrowes conceiued, and thirsting reconciliation vnto them whose shee had any wife offended, as by this worthy example is apparent; when the day before the soffred death, being attended vpon with six Ladies in the Tower, shee took the Lady Kingsley into her Presence Chamber, and there locking the dore vpon them, willed her to sit downe in the chaire of Estate: whereunto shee answered, that it was her duty to stand, and not to sit at all in her presence, much lesse vpon the seat and chaire of her, her Queene. Ah Madam quoth shee, that title is gone, I am a condemned person, and by law have no estate left me in this life; but for clearing of my conscience I pray you sit downe; well said the Lady Kingsley, I have often plaide the foole in my youth; and to fulfill your command, I will doe it once more in mine age, and thereupon sat downe vnder the cloth of estate, which no sooner was done, but that the Queene most homely fell vpon her knees before her, and with teares, holding vp her bands, charged her in the presence of God and his Angels, as the world answereth her before them, when all should appeare in iudgement, that these should so fall downe before the Lady Mary, Grace her daughter in Law; and in her name in like manner, aske her forgiuenesse for the wrongs shee had done her, for till that was accomplished, (the said her conscience could not bee quiet: what her offence was to her ward, wee know not, but may be supposed not to bee capital, the Queene also wayed, the time considered, and her enemies none of the meaneest, only this I obserue, that as shee cleared her conscience of the lesser crimes, so vndoubtedly would shee haue done of the greater, if say had been committed, and so as herselfe instantly desired, I count her case to be charitably spoken of, and leaue her and them vnto the Lord.

(94) But as one pillar for the Gospels defence was fallen by the death of Queene Anne, so another was ruined, by raising Cromwell from the baite of his birth, no better indeed then a Blacke-fishon son, who seruing great Wolsey in the office of his Solicitor, was employed by him for the suppression of forty Monasteries, to the erection of his Colledges at Oxford and Ipwich, by which he mounted those steps of estate, which let (but not kept) him in the high Chaire of his authority: first by King Henry he was made Master of his Iewell-house, then Baron of Okesham in Nottingham, then Knight of the Garter, ere long was created Earle of Ryfel, then was hee made Lord great Chamberlaine, and lastly obtained the Kings Vicar General, and thus late fortune brought him from the forge for a fall.

(95) For King Henry vntill in religious resolution (the Supremacy settled where hee would haue it, and the Reuenues of all Monasteries giuen him by Parliament) sought no further to reforme the Churches abuses, but only gaue way that the Lords Prayer, the Creede, and Commandments might be read in English, which Cromwell procured to be enacted by Parliament. The Commons then misliking that their monialings must downe, and the Monks fore troubled to mingle English in their Masses, the Lincolnshire men beganne a Commotion vnder the conduct of D. Austerlady Monke, who named himselfe Captaine Coley, and his followers were growne well neere vnto twenty thousand. Against these, the King in person prepared, sending forth his command vnto severall Countiees, to charge them with a taxation of furnished Souldiers to meet him at Amphell, as by * one we haue seen signed with the Rampe of his hand, and sent vnto the Bishoppe of Exeter for foure hundred able men, whereof sixscore to be Archers, which great preparation being knowne to the Rebels, they sent to his Majesty these Articles subscribed with many of their hands, the tenor whereof out of the Originall it selfe was as followeth.

To the King our Soueraigne Lord.

Please it your Highnes to be advertised, that your poore Commonalty, true and faithfull Subiects, in your Countie of Lincolne, at this present time assembled, findeth our selues grieved in these Articles hereafter following.

First, for the suppression of so many religious houses, as be at this instant time suppressed. Whereby the seruice of God is not only diminished, but also the poorty of your Realme bee vnrelieued, and many persons bee put from their liuings, and left at large, which we thinke is a great hindrance to the Commonwealth.

The second Article is, that wee humbly beseech your Grace, that the Act of vles may bee repealed, because we thinke that by the said Act we be clea-rely restrained of our liberties, in the declaration of our Willes, concerning our lands: aswell for the payment of our debts, for doing of your Grace seruice, as for helping and relieving of our children, which we have had by the sufferance of your lawes by a long continuance, which as we thinke is great hurt and discommodity to the Common-wealth.

The third Article is, that where your Grace hath a tate, or quincien granted vnto you by Act of Parliament, payable the next yeere: which is, and ever hath been leuable of sheepe and cattall. And the sheepe and cattall of your Subjects within this faide Shire, are now at this instant vterly decayed and gone. Whereby yif your Grace will take the faide tate, your said Subjects shalld be constrained to pay in. d. for a beaft, and x. d. for x. sheepe: And that would be an importunate charge to theyn, considered the poverty that they bee in already, and the losse which they haue sustained thet two yeeres by-past.

The fourth Article is, that wee your crew & faithfull Subjects, thinke that your Grace takes of your Council, and very nigh about you, such Persons as be of low birth, and faine reputation, which haue procured the premysses, most especiall for their singler leure and advantage: the which wee suspect to bee the Lord Cromwell, & Sir Richard Rich Chan- celler of the augmentations.

The fifth Article is, your Grace to haue the xth. and first fruits of every spirituall promotion, of the value of xx. l. and above. And of all other vnder the said value which doe not keepe reference and hospitalty of their faid Benefices.

The sixt Article is, that wee your true Subiectes find them grieved, that there be diuers Bishoppes of England, of your Grace late promotion, that haue subuerted the faith of Crist, as we thinke, which is the Archbyschop of Canterbury, the Byschoppe of Rochester, the Byschoppe of Se Inbarie, the Byschoppe of S. Dunys, and the Byschoppe of Dunelm. And in especiall as we thinke the beginning of all the trouble of this Realme, and the grete exactions that hath bene taken of your poore Community, haue risen by the occasion of the Bishoppes of London: by whole officers, and by other of the Lord Cromwells seruants, a great rumor & noise is risen, and the comune vocis, that such lowelly, plere, and other ornaments of our Parish Churches, which we occupie in the service and honour of God, should bee taken from vs and spoiled in lyke manner and facion, as the housys of Religion hath bene. For a reformation of all and singler the aforesayd abvies, Wee your poore and trewe subiects humble requirys your grace and maiesty, that it might please your highnesse to call vnto you the Nobility of this your Realme, to see each Order and direction concerning all and singler the premisses, as may stand with honor and lewenty of your grace, the welthe and prosperie of your Realme, and the contentation of vs your poore Subiects, and other the whole Community of this your Realme. Whereby wee shall not onely accept your Grace to be the Head and Soueraigne of vs your Subiects, but also accept and take your Grace to bee Supreme head of the Church of England, which wee doe knowledge your Grace trewe inheritance and right.

Also your faide trewe and faithfull subiects, which the hole affect of all your Communaltie of the said Shire, most humble beseecheth your gracious Maiesty, to pardon this poore bearer in doing this his message to your Highnesse, who is your trewe and faithfull subiect, and hath taken this message vpon him for the seruent loue that hee hath to your Grace most in especiall, and for the slaying of your Communaltie ever lesse this rusfull began, hath bene as gladd with all his diligence to slay the commune people for the effusion of blood, as be all his povertie he might. The King with good wordys pacified the Commons, who laying alid wepous embraced their pardons.

threatened fower stormes by the Skies ouercast: for forre thousand Ruffikes assembled in Turkeshire, furnished with Horie, Armour, Artillery and Abilliments for warre, threatened to let the slay of Eilate vpon the progs of their giddy inuentions. Their preence was Religion, and defence of holy Church, their Banners painted with the fise wounds of our Lord, the Challice, the Cake and other lake inuentions of Rome, and vpon their sleeves was write the name of the Lord: and so forward, and so feurent were they in their proceedings, that this their attempt must be termed the holy Pilgrimage. Neither were the Rurali onely gaily in this rebellion, but others of grenter place and degree were associats therein, namely, Edward Lord Archbishop of Turke, and the Lord Thomas Darcy, though both of them constrained by the Rebels as the said Archbishoppe testified vnder his owne hand: but voluntary and most forward were the Clergy of those parts, the Lord Lumley, Sir Thomas and Sir William Percy, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Blgar, and Sir Robert Nall all of them Knights, John Lacy, Richard Desmond and Robert Barnes Esquires: the Bailiffes of Smythe of Leeds, Kellam, and of Beversy. And for Captaine Generall, was Robert Aske a meane Gentleman, and one Randolphe his Assaunt in the Field. Other Commissioners they had out of the Common fort, as James Desmond Generall of the Foot, and a poore Fisherman, filled by himselfe and others, the Earle of Peuery. What authority they bare, among these rude multitude may partly bee perceived by their Mandates and Commissions, & forth in their names, and subscribed with their owne hands, as from the Originals of some of them is here to be seene.

Lords, Knights, Masters, Kinsmen, and Friends, we perceive that you be informed that this Assemblie our Pilgrimage, which we by the fauour and mercy of Almighty God intendeth to procede in, is because the King our Soueraigne Lord hath had much inuasions of vs, wee doubt not but you doe knowe and remember that in our power we haue bene alwayes as ready in payments and seruice to his Highnesse as any his subiects: and farther to ascertain you of the cause of our said assemblie and pilgrimage is this, That forasmuch that such people and small disposed persons being of the Kings Council, hath not onely merced his Grace with many things which bee contrary to the Faith of God, honour of the Kings Maiesty, and the Common wealth of this Realme: and thereby hath defrauded, and vtterly intendeth to destroy the Church of England, and the Ministers of the same, as yet knowe as well as we: but also the said Council hath refused & spited, and further intendeth vtterly to robbe and spoile the whole body of the Kings Realme, and that as well all you, as vs, if God of his infinite mercy had not caused such as hath taken, and hereafter shall take this pilgrimage vpon them to procede in the same: and whether all these things be true or not, we put to your confidence. And if you thinke it be true, and for as much vs, which intendeth the Common wealth of this Realme, and nothing else, we trust you shall haue small specke: For this pilgrimage we haue taken byt for the prefiruation of Christs Church of this Realme of England, the King our Soueraigne Lord the Nobility, Barony and Common of the same, and to the intent to make petition to the Kings Highnesse for reformation of that which is amysse within this Realme. And for punishment of Hereticks & Subverters of Lawes and neither for mercy, justice, nor displeasure to any person, but such as be not worthy to remaine nere the King our Soueraigne Lord person. And further we know if you should obtaine as we trust you God ye shall meet, there ye put both vs and you, your liues and ours in bondage for ouer: and further yet are sure of the interdicti. on of Christs church, and we there and out of the same: And if we are come you, ye shall be in our bytles, wherefore for conclusion, if you will not comen with us for a reformation of the premisses, we certifie you by this our writing that we will feyghe and dye, both as against you, and all those that shall about wards to flappe vs in the said pilgrimage: And God shall shew his Grace and mercy therein: And then

Of such terror and haughty spirit was this Captaine Aske, that when Lancaster an Herald at Armes, was sent to declare the Kings message in Penfret Caille (which the Rebels had got by surrender from the Lord Darcy) hee so blasted out his answers, that the daunted man exculing himselfe to bee but a messenger, tell before him on his knees; till the Archbishop of Towke took him vp, saying, it was not becoming the Court here wote, to prostitute to any, but only to his Soueraigne. Rede likewise if you please this strange Mandate from some meane man among them, the false suggestion that they possessed the ignorant with, and the Oath whereunto these holy Pilgrimes were sworn, as I finde them recorded by themselves in their very words.

To the Comyns of Hantside parish Bailiffs, or Constables, with all the Harmlesse of the same.

We becomend you greet you well, and wher as our brother Poverty, and our brother Feggs, hath forward, as spealy for the aide & assistance of your faith, and holy Church, and for the reformation of such Abbeys and Monasteries, new dissolved and subiects without any Tith cause. Wherefore Gude brethren, forasmuch as our sayd brotherly hath sent to us for aide and helpe, we doe not onely effectually desire you, but also under the paine of deadly sinne we comand you, and enery of you, to be at the shire Greene beside Hantside-herke, the Saturday next being the xxviij. day of October by xi. of the Clocke, in your best array: as you will make answer before the high iudge at the dreadfull day of Doome, and in the payne of pulling downe your houses, and leasing of your gude, and your honor to be at the Captains will: For at the place aforesaid, then and there, ye and we, shall take further direction concerning our faith, so farre decayed, And for gude and laudable customes of the Country. And such naughty inventions and strange Articles new accepted and admitted, so that our said brother bee solbowed, they are yke to profertowards to utter vndaning of the Comyns welthe.

(97) And the more to draw forward the rude multitude which were forward enough of themselves, they set forth in writing their ilandcious in-trudis against the King.

1 The first is that no infane shall receyue the blesed Sacrament of Baptisme, boott onlesse an try-bett to bee payd to the King.

2 The second is that no man vnder xij. Landes shall eyre no brede made of Wheate, nor Capou, chickyn, gois, nor pigge, boott onlesse to pay a trybett to the King.

3 The third is that for every ploghe land the King will hane an trybett, with other diuerse extreme vrgent causes, and herely fare ye well.

The Outh of the holy Pilgrimes.

The oath of the Pilgrimes.

Ye shall not enter into this our Pilgrimage of Grace for the Comyns welthe, but only for the love that you doe here vnto Almyghty Gude his faith, and to holy Church warrant, the maintenance thereof, to the preservation of the Kings person, his issue, to the purifying of Nobilitie, and to expulse all vyleyns blode, and evil Counsellors a-gainsst the Comyns welthe, from his Grace and the prync Counsell of the same: and that ye shall not enter into our said Pilgrimage, for no particuler profite to your selfe, nor to doe no displeasure to no pryncy person, but by Comm-

cell for the Comyns welthe, nor flee, nor murder for no cause, but in your hearts put away all feare and dread, and take afore you the Crosse of Cryste, and in your hearts his faith, the reformation of the Church, the subpression of these Heretics, and their eggyngs, by all the bolle contents of this Booke.

And for the obseruation of this Oath, herre another commande of the Commissioners, as we finde it recorded.

To the Bayliffe and Communes of the Towne of Skarboro.

We becomend, we Francis Byrd Knight, and John Halem yemas, in the name of all the Communes, commande and charge you, that ye assemble your feloes together medeately vpon receite herof, and so take theyr othe mychly we here send vnto you, and then after in all hastye possible to gysse and bynde them ouer brethren, wome we sende in belongy vnto Kafe Ewre the younger Knight, nor any other whiche did not take full parte with the Communes, at ever first and last a fenswyrge, in whys name, authority, or attorney fower they come, waleffe they haue licence of all the communes, in like manner, ye shall truly keepe all fychis or damages and shewe to the use of the Communes, wryte mychly we charge you at our laste being Against these roar of Rebels, George Earle of Shrewsbury, not staying for the Kings commission mynistr his men, midcomd of many, that he meant to be a Pilgrime himselfe, vnto which inspectors hee made a loyall Oration, declaiming all intencion against their attempts, how colourable soe they laide their pretence, which dooe be caused his Chap-len to minister him an Oath of his loyaltie, before them in the Field. It was likewise reported that the Earle of Darby was set forward towards them, whome the Pilgrimes well hoped would haue sided with them, as by their mandate sent to the Brethren appeares, where is forbid that none of them should aide him, vntill hee tooke the Oath which hee neuer meant to ally or swear to.

As M. A. C.

(98) But true it is the King sent Thomas Duke of Norfolke, Lord Generall against them, accompanied with the Marquisse of Exeter, the Earles of Man-tingdon and Rutland, who ioining their powers made towards Doncaster, wher the Rebels then lay in their Randinow, in whose sight immediately they set vp their Tents, and determined battell vpon the next day; but on the night betwixt, such floods of water fell, that the river Don overflew his bankes, and admitted no passage ouer the Bridge, which thing was taken as a token from God, and thereupon the Lord Generall offered them Conference, alleaging that the King was tender of his Subjects liues, and very vnwilling to shed Christian blood: that their cause should be honourably heard, and iust complaints redressed, if with submission and duty of Subjects, they would yield themselves & affaires to the Kings mercy; that this their rebellions proceedings, was not onely the fortunanning messenger of destruction to themselves and partakers, but gave also a great advantage vnto the Scots, the dangerous enemie vnto the Land, and them all: with these and the like perswasions the matter was so forwarded, that a conference was appointed at Doncaster, and fourte pledges were sent from the Lord General vnto

Ex Original Act.

Whole Articles and demands were these, as followeth.

The instruction for Sir Thomas Hilton and other Companions.

The demands of the Commons

- 1 First to declare to the Duke of Norfolk, and other the Lord's, that obedient of our meeting of our party, surely is meant and thought of a sured truth, without any manner of disguise, or male engine.
 - 2 The second is touching the King's fauourableness, vnder the braue Seale of Englande, and to deliver our fauourableness, and promise, vnder euer bands, for the Lord's there.
 - 3 The thirde is to entreate of euer generall pardon, for offence, and all persons, which be within the Realm, whiche in herie, word, or deed offendeth, by their procure, the furtherance in this our quarrell, may be pardoned life, lands, goods, and that in the said pardon, nor other the King's records, we be not witten repaired, ne taken, at Rebellious or treason, nor reles fill in the same.
 - 4 The fourth that Thomas Cromwell, nor any of his bande or serie, be not at euer meeting at Downshire, but absent themselves from the Council.
 - 5 The fift, to receive the King's answer by the declarations of the Lords, and to certifye the were cleint thereof to us there.
- Also to know what authority the Lords have to create, in priuies with us here, as well of euer promise of other things.

Also to know what plege the myll deliver for our Capitans.

Also of thys petyculars be concluded, then for to consider of other petyculars.

1 The first touching our faith to haue the hereticks of Luther, Wycch, Huss, Melancton, Ecolampadius, Bafis, the Confession Germane, the Appyle of Melancton, the works of Tyndale, of Bernys, Fryth, of Atarball, Rayfeld, the Remedy of Sent Germane, and such other of any manner Heretick, without the Realm, not to be kept, but utterly to be destroyed.

2 The second to haue the supreme of the Chyrch touching our seruile to be reserved in the see of Rome, as before byt was acknowledged for to be, and to haue the consecration of Bishoppes, from hym without any first frute, or penyence to him to be paid out of thys Realm, or elys a penyence reasonable for the outward defence of our faith.

Also we beske humble our most drade Sovereign Lord that the Lady Mary may be legitimate, and the estatutes contrary to the same to be annulled for the dome of the title that may be incur to the Crown by Scotland, and that to be by Parliament.

Also to haue the Abbeys that be suppressed to be restored to their Lands, Tenures, and Goods.

Also to haue the Tenants and first fruits clearly discharged, vnder the Clergy wyl of their fillys grant a Rent or Charge to the augmentation of the Crown.

Also to haue the Priores obsequies restored to their houses againe.

Also to haue the Hereticks Bishoppes, and temporal men of their seite, to haue condigne punishment by fire, or such other, or els to trauel their quarrell with us and our parliament house.

Also to haue the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Chancellor, and Sir Ryc. Ryke Knight to haue condigne punishment, as subverters of the goodwills of the Realm, and enemies of the best felicity of this false hereticks first encounter and breengers of them.

Also that the Landys in Westmorland, Cumberland, Kendale, Dent hyd, Furnes, and the Abbeys lands in York, Worsleyshire, Kerkylshire, Newcastel, maye be returned Right, and the lord to haue at every change two yeres rent, in the name of a agreement, and so more, according to a grant now made by the Lords to the Commons vnder their Seales, and thus to be done by Act of Parliament.

Also the hand-punys and Crispe-boys, with the penaltie of the same to be repelled, unless byt be in the King's service, and to be to hylers of Deere.

Also that Doctur Lat, and Doctur Leyton, may haue condigne punishment for their extorsions in time of visitation, in hereticks, as some reles your houses, x. l. xx. l. for other summes, by the hereticks, vntill now, lesse, vnder euent fealties, by them taken, and other abominable Acts by them committed and done.

Also to see reformation for the election of Knights of shire, and the Burgys, and for the use among the Lords in the Parliament after the ancient custome.

Also the Statute for inclosing Intactes to be put in execution, that all Intactes, by the first Anno quarto Henrici Reptim be pulled downe exceeding Forty, and Parrys to be destroyed of these quations, and tax now granted by Parliament.

Also to haue the Parliament in a convenient place as Nottingham or York, and the same to be so muched shortly.

Also that it may be enacted by authority of Parliament, that all recondemns, Statutes, penaltys, newly forfeyted during the tyme of the Communion may be pardoned & discharged, as well against the King as stranger.

Also the Priuilege of the Right of the Church to be confirmed by Act of Parliament, and Priests not to suffer unless they be degraded, a man to be (not) by his Rector, Sanctuary to save a man in all causes in extreme need, and the Church to save a man for forty dayes; and further according to the lawes as they were used in the beginning of the King's dayes.

Also the liberties of the Church to haue their old Chancellors, as the County Palatines of Durham, Downe, Rippon, S. Peter of York, and such other by Act of Parliament.

Also to haue the Statute that no man shall declare his will on his land to be repelled.

Also the Statute of treason for Warrys, made sixth Anno xxi. of our Sovereign that were to be in like wise repelled.

Also that the common Law may haue place as well as was used in the beginning of your gracious reign, and that all innovations be clerely denied, and not granted, unless the matter be heard in the Chancery, and there determined.

Also that no man upon sub poena, or Priory Scale from Trent Northward, appare but at York, for that which is not hold of the King, and against the Promoters thereof.

Also remedy against Exchequer for suing of false Officers, and extorsions in taking of Fees, for that which is not hold of the King, and against the Promoters thereof.

These were the Instructions given to their Commissioners to be conferred upon, all which as it should seme, were drawn into foure Articles or heads, as by the remnant of the King's answer thereto doth appere: which Originall in many places with his owne hand is interlined with so wise and learned additions, as doe confirme his Kingly care, both for the Chyrch and common weale: the true copy whereof to his great fame is as followeth: his correctiues and additions is marred from the rest by several Charrells.

Fift

The whole details was to draw with the Gospel.

An unchangeable motion.

First, as touching the maintenance of the Faith, the termes bee so generall, that it would bee very hard to make certaine answer to the same; but if they meane the faith of Christ, to the which all Christen men be (wonly) bound: wee declare and protest our selfe to be that Prince, that doth enend, and hath alwayes minded to line and die in the maintenance, defence, (and) obseruation, and purity of the same. And that no man can or dare let his foote by vs in prouling of the contrary. Maruelling therefore much that ignorant people would goe about to take vpon them to instruct and teach vs (which hath) become noted (to be) learned what the faith should be: And also that they being ignorant people be so presumptuous (seeing that wee and our hole Clergy in Conuocation hath in Articles declared it) would take vpon them to correct vs all thereon. Or that they would bee so ingrate and vnnatural towards vs their most rightfull King, and naturall Soueraigne Lord, without any our desert, vpon false reports or surmises to suspect vs of the same, and giue rather credence to forged light tales, then to the very truth by vs these twenty eight yeeres vied, and by our deedes approved.

To the second which toucheth the maintenance of the Church, and the liberties of the same we say it is so generall a proposition that without distinctions no man with truth can answer it, neither by Gods lawes, nor by the lawes of the Realme. For first, the Church which they mean must be known: Second, whether those things which they call liberties, and say they would maintaine, be things lawfull and beneficiall to that Princes common wealth, or otherwise. And their knowe we doubt not but they shall bee answered according to Gods law, equity and iustice. Nevertheless for all their generality this wee dare affirme, that (meaning what Church they list) Wee haue done nothing that may not be asiden by, both by Gods lawes and mans lawes, or that is prejudiciall to our common wealth, if our proceedings may be indifferently considered. And in our owne Church of England, whereof wee be the supreme head on Earth, we haue done nothing so (extremely) and as many of our Predecessors haue done, vpon much lesser grounds. Wherefore sithers this Article pertaineth nothing to any of our Commons, nor that they beare anything therein, we cannot but reckon a great vnkindnesse and vnnaturalitie in them, which had leuer a Chorle or twaine should enioy those profits of their Monasteries, for the supportation and maintenance of abominable life, then that we their Prince should recieve the same towards our extreme charges, doon, and duly sustained for their defence against foraine enemies.

The third Article toucheth three things: the first is the lawes, the second is the common wealth, the third, the directors of the lawes vnder vs. Touching the Lawes, as it becometh not blindmen to indge any colours, ne to take vpon them to be iudges of the same: so wee dare exprefly and boldly affirme as a thing that may bee easily and duely proued, that there were neuer in any One of our Predecessors dayes, so many wholesome, commodious and beneficiall Acts made for the common wealth, as haue bin made in our time, & it shewes some of them had (experience) & doing (in the world,) that wold now purchase (vain) prycke them thanke without desert. For our Lord forbid that both wee and our Councell should haue lost so much time, as not to know better now then wee did in the beginning of our raigne; what were a Common wealth, and what were against the good and commodity of the same, seeing wee haue bene a King these twenty eight yeeres, and by experience learned the pernitensse thereof: and although the folly and vnkindnesse of some will not perchance let them so knowledge it, yett wee trust and doubt not, but the most part of our louing Subjects, speciallie those which bee not seduced by false reports, doe both thinke it, accept it, and finde it so. Now touching the Common wealth, what King hath kept his Subjects so long in wealth and peace, so long without taking or doing wrong one to another, so indifferently ministred iustice to all estates both high and low; so defended them from all outward enemies: so fortified the frontiers of his Realme so bis so little, and in manner inestimable charges, and all for their wealth and suretie? What King hath giuen among his Subjects moe generall or freer pardons? What King hath bene lother to punish his Subjects, or shewed more mercy among them? these things being so true, as no true man can deny them: It is an vnnatural and an vnkind demeanour of vs our Subjects to beleue or deeme the contrary of it: by whose report fouer it should be set forth against vs. And the beginning of our raigne, where it is said that so many Noblemen were Counsellors: we doe not forget who were then Counsellors: for of the Temporality there were but two worthy to be called Noble, the oon, the Treasurer of England, the other the high Steward of our household. Others, Gentlemen, (and) yet of no great lands, till they were promoted by vs, and so made Knights and Lords; the rest were Lawyers and Priests, sining the two Bishops of Canterbury and Winchester: If these then bee the great number of Noblemen, that is spoken off, and that our Subjects feared them concerned withall, why then bee they not now much better contented with vs, which haue so many Nobles indeed, both of birth and condition of our Councell. For first of the Temporality in our Priny Councell, wee haue the Duke of Norfolke, the Duke of Suffolke, the Marquess of Exeter, the Lord Straw and (when bee is present) the Earle of Oxford, the Earle of Suffex, the Lord Sanders our Chamberlaine, the Lord Admirall Treasurer of our house: Sir William Paulet Comptroller of our house. And of the Spirituallie, the Bishops of Canterbury, Winchester, Hereford, and Chichester. (And for because it is more then necessary to haue some in our Priny Councell leuied in our lawes, and parts of the world: see by the aduise of our hole Councell of former tyme, did elect and chosse into our Priny Councell, and also into their roomer our Chamberler and Priny Celles, shynking them men in all our opinion, most meetest for the same roomer, and see with our hole Councell shooke it ryght strange, and yet, which bee but bratt, and vnexpert felde, doe take vpon you to appoint vs, Ne for our part wee will take any such thing as any of our Subjects hands. Wherefore wee would that henceforth they should better remember the duties of good Subjects towards their naturall Liege Lord, and meddle no further of those or such like things, as they haue nothing to doe withall.

name certaine of our Councel to be subverters both of Gods law, and the lawes of this Realme: Wee doe take and repute them as iust and true Executors both of Gods Law, and as ferre as their Commissions vnder vs doe extend. And if any of our Subjects can duly prouoe the contrary wee shall proceede against them and all other offenders therein, according to iustice, as to our estate and dignity royall dooth appertaine. And in case it be but a false and an vntrue report, as we verily thinke it is, then it were as meet and standeth afield with iustice, that they should haue the selfe same punishment, which wrongfully hath obiected this to them, that they should haue had, if they had deserued it. And oon thing among others cansteth vs to thinke that this slander should bee vnerue, because it proceedeth from that place, which is both farre distant from that where they inhabite, and also from those people which neuer heard them preach, nor yet know any part of their conversation. Wherefore we exhort all ye our Commens to be no more so light of credit in the beleueing of yuel things (spoken of vs your natural Prince and Soueraigne Lord: Nor of any of our Prelates and Counsaillors, but to thinke that your King hauing so long reigned ouer you with the aduise of his Councill hath as good discretion to elect and chuse his Counsaillors, as those who so euer they bee that hath put this in your heads [or ye other being but ignorant people and ought off all expoynt off princes affairs.]

Here in this small point which yee our Commens of Yorkshire, Westmerland, Cumberland, the Bishopricke of Durham, Eshemondshire, Crauen, Dent, Sedburie, and all other places that haue bene fidocied to this Iustification doe desire; and also in the matter of the whole discourse of your Petitions. We verily thinke that the rest of all our hole Commens of many Countreys to whom you be in manner but an handfull, will greatly disdaine and not beare it, that you take vpon you to set order to vs and them, and specially to vs [being] Soueraign Lord to you both: [you being rebellers]

And that [because you be rebells,] you would make them as beaers and pertakers of your mischief, willing them to take pardon for Insurrections which verily we thinke and doubt not they neuer minded: but like true Subjects to the contrary haue both with heart and deede been ready at our call to defend both vs and themselves: and now for our parte as to your demands, we let you wit, that pardon of such things as you demanded lyeth onely in the will and pleasure of the Prince: but it seemeth by your lewde proclamations and false conductes, that there becomings you which take vpon them both the parts of Kings and Counsaillors. Which neither by vs nor by the Generall consent of our Realme hath been admitted to any such roome. What arrogancie it then in those wretches being also of none experience, to presume to raise you our Subjects without Commission or authoritie: yee and against vs vnder a cloked colour of your wealth and in our name, and as the successe and ende would declare if wee should not be more mercifull vnto you then you haue deserved to your owne vnter confusions. Wherefore wee late all you our said Subjects againe wit, that were it not that our Princely heart cannot recken this your shamefull insurrection and most ingrate and vnaturall rebellion to bee done of malice or rancour, but rather by a lightnesse giuen in manner by a naughty nature to a Comunalty, and a wondrous sudden surreption of Gentlemen: We must needs haue excused an other manner of punishment, then if you will humbly knowledge your fault, and submit your selfe to our mercie, wee extend to doe [as by our proclamations we doe] [ye be informed.]

The effect that the Kings reply wrought, is manifested by his five pardons sent vnto the offenders, by Proclamation disuolged by his messenger at Armes and his trumpet throughout the North parts, the tenour whereof from the Originall is; as followeth.

All hee ye, that youe the Kings Subjects and Commens dwelling and inhabiting in the Shires of York, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland, the Bishopricke of Durham, the City of York, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Rynglan vpon Hull, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Newcasle vpon Tyne, and the Shire of the same, and in other Shires, Townes, Dales, places primiledged, the Franchises and Liberties within the limits of the said Shires, Cities, and Townes, or any of them, or being repared or taken for any part, parcel, or number of any of them, and such other the Kings said Subjects, inhabiting in the Towne of Lancaster, or else where by North, in the Shire of Lancastere, haue now of late attempted and committed, manifest and open rebellion, against his most royall Majesty, whereby was like to haue ensued, the utter ruin and destruction of this hole Countrey, to the greivous comfort and auancement of your ancient enemies the Scots, which as his Highnes is credably informed, doe with a great Redoubt vnder the same, and to the high displeasure of God, who strictly commandeth you to obey your Soueraigne Lord and King, in all things, and not with violence to resist his will or Commandement, for any cause whatsoever it be: Men therefore the Kings most Majesty, perceiving as well by the Articles of their poyntes sent to his Highnes: As also dewly informed by credible reports, that their offences proceeded of ignorance, and by occasion of sundrie false tale peace minded or extended by his Highnes, or any of his Councell, but most especially contrived and most spitefully set abroad among you, by certayne malicious and felonious persons; and thereupon his Highnes inclined to extend his most gracious mercy and pity towards you, hauing these charges of you under God, both of your soules and bodies, and desiring rather the preferuacion of the same, and your reconciliation, by his most humble means, then by the order and rigour of Iustice to punish you according to your demerits, of his inestimable goodness, benignity, mercy, and pity, and at your most humble petitions and supplications made vnto his Highnes, he is content & pleased to give and grant, and by his present Proclamation doth give & grant vnto you, al and full & entire your confederacies, wheresoever they dwell, of estate, degree, or what condition soeuer you or they be, or by what name or names soeuer they or you be, or may be called, his Generall and free pardon for all manner of treasons, rebellions, insurrections, misprisions of treason, murders, robberies, felons, and of all offences of the same, and of euery of them, vntersfull assemblies, vntersfull Comunitiees, vntersfull speaking of wordes, confederacies, riots, routs: And all other trespasses, offences and contemptes, done and committed by you, or any of you against the Kings Majesty, his Crowne or dignitie royal, within and from the time of the beginning of the said rebellion wheresoever it was, vnto the present day of proclaiming of this Proclamation, and of all poyntes, iudgements, and executions of death, and all other penalties, forfeitures, fines, and forfeitures of Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods or Cattle by any of your forfeitures incurred by reason of the premises, or any of them: which Fines, Forfeitures, Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods, and Cattle, the Kings said Highnes of his speciall grace, and more motion by these presents, giueth to each of you, as haue or should haue forfeited, or lost the same, by occasion of the premises or any of them: And also his Highnes is pleased, and contented, that you and euery of you from time to time, shall and may haue upon your seruites to be made hereafter in his Chancery, his said end most gracious and free pardon vnder his great Seale concerning the premises, without any further bill or Warrant to bee obtained for the same, and without paying any thing for the great Seale thereof: And that you and euery of you from time to time, may freely and liberally serue for his said pardon, when and as often as it shall like you, without any trouble, vexation or impeachment Perdill.

Notwithstanding this Generall pardon and merciful dealings of the King a new Insurrection was raised in the North, wherein many of the former were now againe Actors, as by name Robert Aske whom the King had not onely pardoned, but also highly rewarded, the Lord Dueris, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Bygnd, Palmer, Percy, Hamilton, Tempest and Lewley, all of them put to death, as they well deserved.

(92) In which Commotions those men whose profession was onely the Booke and their Beades, mistaking Christs meaning, who had his Disciples to sell their coats, and to buy a sword, came armed among the Rebels into the Field, and with them were as Traitors against the Crowne: for which offence many of them suffered death: namely, John Fellow Abbot of Whaley in Lancashire, John Cas-legate and William Haydocke Monks of the same house, Robert Heles Abbot of Werborne in Bedfordshire, Adam Seadbury Abbot of Gersuace with Andrew a Monke of that house; the Abbot of Sawley in Lancashire and the Prior of the same place, William Wold Prior of Birlington, the Parson of Padington, five Priests of Lancashire, and with them their chiefeaine, Captaine Collier, and John Allen Priest.

(100) The flatterers thus quieted and the Statesmen as lesaure to prevent the like, a Commission came forth to purge the Churches of Idols; and to suppress the Monasteries to the King: vñ, granted unto him by Parliament: the one of them, the onely working cause, through the gaine that was got by ignorant devotion, and gadding on pilgrimage, and the other, the Nest and very receptacle of all traiterous attempters, against the peace of the Land and Supremacy of the Crowne. The abolish of the first was solemnly shewed at Pauls Crosse in London, upon Sunday the twenty foure of February, by Doctor John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, where the Rood of Boxley in Kent, commonly called the Rood of Grace, made with divers vices to bow downe and to lift up it selfe, to shake, and to stirre both Head, hands, and feet, to rowle the eyes, moove the lippes and to bend the bowes; was then broken and pulled in peeces. So likewise the Images of our Lady of Wallingham and Ipswich, let and be sprinkled with lewell, and Gemmes, with divers others both of England and Wales; were brought to London and burnt at Chelsey before the Lord Cromwell. Then the Axes of the heven began to cast downe the walls of all Monasteries, whose number (as Camden doth account them) were sixe hundred forty nise, besides four score and tenne Collegges, them of Oxford and Cambridge not accounted: of Hospitals one hundred and tenne, and of Chauntries and free Chap-pels two thousand, three hundred, twenty foure, all of them almost were then borne downe with the sudden deluge of those tempestuous times, vñ, till the world flood amazed, King Henrie proceeded, and the Clergy men groaned vnder their owne destructions; among the Shrine of Thomas Becket was defaced, which did abound with more then Princely riches: whose meanest part was pure gold, garnished with many precious stones, as Erasmus that saw it, hath written, whereof the chiefeit was a rich Gemme of France, offered by King Lewis, who asked and obtained of you may be sure, he saying it (so deare) that no passenger between Dover and Whitland, should perish by shipwracke; his bones by Stephen Langton had bene laid in a golden Shrine, his name canonized, and the day of his death made annually holy, such concourse of Pilgrimes, such pressing to touch him, and chace creeping, and kneeling to his Tombe, that the prints of their deagion in the Marble stones, remains to this day; every Pillar resounding the miracles of this reputed Martyre, and the Church it selfe dedicated to Christ, forced to give place to the name of Saint Thomas.

The Timber worke of this Shrine was covered with plates of gold, damasked and embossed with wires of gold, garnished with brooches, Images, angells, precious stones, and great Orient Peries: all these defaced filled two Chests and were for price of an un-estimable value. But in Steele of these Daggers, the golden English was commanded to be read in all Churches, and Register Bookes of weddings, Christenings and Burials in every of them to be kept.

(101) The yettely reuencues of these, as they were valued by the Commissioners, at their subscriptions amounted to an unchamable summe, as ap-peareth by the Original Booke it selfe prented to the King, wherein more shall be spoken in the end of this chapter, and yett most of them rated at Robur-bated penny-worthes, what their rents were, a libell carried abroad, and read to the king, by demonstration did prove, wherein was accounted, that vnto the five Orders of Friers, (every householder paying them five pence the Quarter) the summe of forty three thousand, three hundred, thirty three pounds, six shillings and eight pence sterling, was paid them by yeere, besides the renewing of their owne lands, which was not a little, so that not without cause many entered into a Monasticall life, rather to live at ease, and without cares of this world, then to feede the flocke of Christ, or to winne them, and not them, after the example of the Apostles. For the Testament of Christ, was vnto most of these, as a booke sealed with seaven seales, and their mouthes vnmuzzled they did deuoure, but not tread out the Corne, so that the Sunne by their doctrine seemed to be darkened, as with smoke, and themselves to be the Locusts that overpeerd the superficies of the Earth, whose faces were like men, pretending humanity, their haire like women in shew of modesty, their Crownes of counterfeited gould, signifying their rusted authoritie, their teeth like Lyons shewing their Tyranny, their force like horses prepared for battel, their habergions of lion betokening their strength, the sound of their wings, the thundring out their mandates like to the rumbling of Chariots in warre, their Tails (the false Prophets) haling flings like vnto Scorpions, and their King the bad A-baddon, even the Angell of the Bottomless pit. All these allusions most aptly fitting these Cloistered Friers, who now grown to the height of their finnes, their skirts were discovered, that their flame might appeare; being the only men then laid open to the

thers in other forcible parts) two in the daies of K. Henry the fourth, the first English King that put anie to death for the doctrine of Rome; (omitting Sir John Oldcastle and others, that died for the Gospel's defence, in the daies of King Henry the fifth) foure in the raigne of innocent Henrie the sixth. One in the daies of King Edward the fourth, and tenne in the time of King Henry the fourth, sealed the doctrine against the papall religion with their blood; all of them being martyred before that Martin Luther wrote. And in the raigne of this King twenty five suffered the fire, before the flames thereof could be quenched, which a while was done by the means of good Queene Anne, till afterwards they mounted higher, when the five Articles were made; but because this Ecclesiasticke text is handled elsewhere, we will referre the Reader for their matters vnder the industrious paines of that worthy and ever venerable man M. Fox, taken in his Acts & Monuments of Ecclesiasticall history.

(103) The Monasteries thus dissolved, and the Revenues thereof converted to temporal uses, King Henry rancie in great obloquie of many foraine Potentates, but most especially of the Pope; who with Cardinal Pole infligated diuers Princes in Christendom to invade England thus fallen from his faith: Yea, & home-borne Subjects disliking the course for Papisticall subversion, by secret working sought to deprive King Henry, and so raised up Reynold Pole vnto the Regall dignity, as by their indentments appeareth. The persons conspired, were Lord Henry Courtney Marquisse of Essex, & Earle of Deuonshire, the sonne of Lady Katherine, the sixth daughter of King Edward the fourth: Henric Paule Lord Montacute, with Sir Geffrey his brother, and Sir Edward Nevill brother to the Lord of Abergheny. These Poles were the sonnes of Lady Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, the onely daughter of George Duke of Clarence: and of these Reynold Pole once Deane of Essex, and now Cardinal at Rome was accounted the onely man.

(104) And this forsaide Lord Marquisse had formerly bene in such fauour with King Henry, that at his going into France he ordained him his Heire apparant, though at his returne vpon grame deliberation, he sawe it better policy to placke him downe then was vsed in setting him vp, left in setting his part vpon that infestine ilage, hee put the land to as much trouble as the arrested Duke Richard of Yorke had done, after hee was ordeined heire apparant, which Title produced the Tragedy of his raiser King Henry the sixt, and now hauing him and his Abettors vpon the aduantage, the better to secure his owne Estate, hee caused the heades of this Lord Marquisse with the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevill to be cut off vpon Tower-hill.

(105) The King then a Widower, since the death of Queene Jane, who departed this life two yeeres before, meant to maintain what hee had done, manag all opposites: which the better to effect, by the Councill of Lord Cromwell, he sought and obtained the alliance of the Princes of Germany, and heard the motion for marriage with the Lady Anne sister to William Duke of Cleue, whose other sister Fredericke Duke of Saxony had espoused, a great fauourer of the Gospel, and maintainer of Martin Luther the zealous Preacher and professor thereof. But whether for the death of Anne Bullen, or that hee would haue his wiues sister bestowed neerer at home (which thing hee pretended) a great hinderer hee was of that match. But the Lady sent into England, and married vnto King Henry, seemed no lesse pleasing in his eye; which Stephen Gardiner then Bishoppe of Winchester perceiving, thought it a fitt subiect for him to worke vpon, against the Lord Cromwell the maker of the match; hee therefore instigated ieaousies dayly into the Kings eare, first exasperating the hatred of the Princes of Germa- ny to him-wards, and especially of Duke Fredericke his compellive brother in Law, the Emperor, French Kings, Scots and the Pope, all seeking at once to raise their powers against England. The ciuill tumults lately passed, and new commotions greatly to be feared, hee letted not to remember; and all to nip the spring of the new spreading Gospel, whereby this wise Politician in the end got fix such Articles against it, as the Consistory of Hell could devise no worse. Whole cruelties were such that not long after, and in the daies of this King, some of those Acts were again repealed, and some of them qualified, as too sharpe and reaching into the blood of the Kings best Subjects.

(106) The fruite of these blood-thirsty infligators, the Lord Cromwell and Lady Anne of Cleue loomed, he by imprisonment and death, and the by disgrace and disuice; hauing been his wife from January to Iune, in all which time the King refrained the mutual knowledge of her body, for the dislike hee had of her person, euen at the first sight, as himselfe called to witness the Lord Cromwell when Prisoner in the Tower, for whose report hee wrote a Letter with his owne hand; and these good Lady no other cause alledged, was disuiced by Parliament, when also it was enacted that these should no longer bee styled Queene. The Lord Cromwell was charged by the Lord Rich, and Sir George Throgmorton with speaking of certaine generall words, not excepting therein the Kinges person, which neuerthelesse were thought to sleight and insufficient to take away his life, that his enemies feared to put it to the triall of his Peeres, lest he should be acquitted by them, as the Lord Dueris of the North now many yeeres before had bene; wherefore there was a Bill drawne to attain him of heretic and Treason, in generall words, rather then in particular proofes, which when hee was dead, passed in both houses of Parliament with the Kings assent:

(107) Howbeit Samuel that seldome speakes well of the Gospel's professors, will haue him to die for the breach of a Law made by himselfe, which was, that one appeached of treason, should not come in the Kings presence, till he had trued himselfe nor guilty; but besides that wee find no such Act by him made; his Indictment doth not charge him with treason, but with setting at liberty certain persons committed for misprision of treason and heresie; for fauouring and maintaining the translation of hereticall bookes into English; for bearing out Barnes and other hereticall Preachers; that himselfe was an hereticke, and had spoken words, great words for the vpholding of his said religion, which were, that she King should not change it if hee would; for these things hee was arraigned by Parliament of high Treason, and that grounded eicher vpon a Statute made in the five and twenty of Edward the third, or else by the explanation of that Act which reffereth the exposition of Treasons to the Parliament, and so no way did Cromwell deuise or make any law of treason, which himselfe first fell into, as that partiall Romanist hath said.

(108) But most sure it is, that the Kings affection, altogether guided by the fairest obiect, found no other point in the Compass to fixe his variable eye, besides that onely, which by his freeming was touched by the Loose-dione of nature, and the same to bee the Lady Katherine Howard, daughter to Edward the brother of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, against whom Cromwell standing in the defence of Queene Anne, and vying words of dislike in the Lady Katherine, distastfull vnto the King, was therupon apprehended (his enemy to working) and vpon the twenty eight of Iuly suffered death with the stroke of the Axe vpon Tower-hill, with whom was beheaded the Lord Hungerford of Heisterbury, neither so Christianly suffering, nor so quietly dying for his offence committed against nature.

Neither was it put vp, vntill that the heades of Queen Katherine Howard, and the Lady Jane Becheford were stricken off, the one for Adultery, the other for concealement, as was alleged, the parties offending were Francis Dereham, and Thomas Culpeper, Dereham before thee was Queene, and Culpeper after, who both were executed at Tyburne, the tenth of December, and the twelfth of February following. Mistrresse Katherine Howard (for so in the Act of Attainrate thee is called) who had beene filled and receiued Queene for the space of sixe months, and foure dayes, with the Lady Jane then in widow, and late wife vnto George Bullen, Lord Becheford, were both of them brought vnto a Scaffold raised vpon the hill within the Tower, wherethey in lamentable passions suffered death.

(110) Howsoever those times afforded such Queenes to the Kings bed, or himselte vnto fortune in making his choise: yet many of no meane iudgement haue rather accused King Henry for his changing and variable affections, then thinker them guilty in the breach of Marriomoy. Of Anne wee haue seene what hath bene said, and of this Queene lets heare what shee proceiued after her condemnation to Doctor Willelme Bisshopp of Winchester her last Confessor, and by him deliuered to a noble young Lord of her name, and neere alliance: Her words were these: As to the All my reuerend Lord for which I stand condemned, God and his holy Angells I take to witness for my faultes saluation, that I did guiltlesse, neuer hewing to abused my Soueraignes bed: what other faultes and follies of youth I haue committed, I will not excuse; but am assured that for this, God hath brought this punishment vpon me, and will in his mercy remitt them, for which I pray you, pray with me, vnto his fauour and my Souerain Christ.

(111) As thefe then in case of Treasons eyther acted or intended, ended their liues; so others in case of conscience (though diuersly affected) came to their deaths, and that by force of the Statutes enacted vnder this Kings whereof one was the abolishing of the Pope, and the oath of Supremacy, the refusal of either made offenders in state of high Treason, and the other in case of religion, when the fixe Articles enacted by Parliament, was made Heretic and death, to such as held or taught the contrary, which Articles were thus concluded in both the houses of Parliament with consente of the King.

1 That after the words of consecration spoken by the Priest, the reall and naturall body and blood of Christ, as hee was conceived and crucified, was in the Sacrament, and no other substance consisting, in the forme of bread and wine, besides the substance of Christ God and man.

2 That the communion in both kinds was not necessarie vnto saluation, the flesh onely in forme of bread, sufficient for the Laity.

3 That Priests after they haue receiued orders might not marry by the law of God.

4 That the vowes of chastity either in man or woman, ought by Gods law to be observed, and by which they are exempted from other liberties of Christian people.

5 That priuate Masse was necessary for the people, and agreeable to the law of God.

6 That aniclar confession was expedient to be retained, and continued in the Church of God.

These Statutes I lay aswell the one as the other, brought man to their ends, which otherwise were very good Subiects, and worthy instruments in the common weale: for offending in the first, there died Bisshopp Fisher, and Sir Thomas More, besides many Abbots, Priors, and Friars, and among them, in Smithfield the Welsh rode first Frier Ferriell on fire, according to the prophesy very ripe in their mouths, that this holy rode should set a whole forell on fire. For the other suffered in flames, many godly Christians, whereof Robert Barner a reuerend Doctor, and worthy minister of Christ, the first reducer (as M. Fox reporteth) of the Vnaserity of Cambridge from rudenesse and barbarity, vnto good literature and learning, was with the first: And Anne Aske a Gentlewoman of an incomparable dexterity one of the last, who, aboue the weaknesse of her sexe most valiantly stood against the violence of the time.

(112) Her birth was worshipfull, and education accordingly, bestowed in marriage, vnto John Kyme a Gentleman in Lincolneshire, and commended by Rale for her rare wit, and elegant beauty; which her parents the pensill of N. D. with his vniuersall hand (euer ouerhard to shadow the truth), hath slanderously blam'd and measured those graces in her, by his owne looke affections, and those wanton Vories, which in the height of linnehaue changed the naturall vie of women against nature.

This young heifer (saith hee) abiding no yoke, a coy dame, and of very small fame, left the company of Master Kyme, to gadde up and drowne a Goswell, and Gossiping where shee might, and egiht not, but especially in London, and neere the Court, was soon being faire and but twenty five years old at her death, such easily shew what may be suspected of her life, and the myrricall speeches and demands of the Kings Counsell touching her departure from her husband, were grounded vpon somewhat, especially on that shee called her selfe Anne Aske alias Kyme. This false this scandalizing man hath accused this holy Anne by the onward appearance of her youth and beauty: as holy Anne by Eli was accused of drunkennesse when her heart was most serene, in supplications to her God, and his partial pen made the same to lift the wheate of her holy conuersion to finde out some chaffe, whereof none is free, nor is there to be condemned vpon the imagerie of his suspitious head (who vndoubtedly would haue told all if any thing could haue bene found) whereas shee in the vigour of beany and weaknesse of her Sexe, resisted the gaine-sayers of the truth with her dearest blood: testifying from the Prisons her faith and constancy, and from the Racke preached Christ, whereon most vnhumane and against kind, hee was twice tormented; and lastly sealed her testimonie in Smithfield through the flames of fire: being borne to the place of her death in a Chair, her bones so disoimbed by the Racke that shee could not goe.

(113) The irreuerend * N. D. whose affection to Christs Gospell and loyalty to the English Crowne hath sufficiently shewed it selfe, to make her no Martyr, and that her life did demerit the Racke, saith that the King himselte commanded that torture to be inflicted, for infecting with her erroneous doctrine, his Court, his Nieces, Suffolkes daughters, and his Queene. Whereas the truth tels vs that the Lieutenant refusing to racke her the second time was threatened by Wriethley Lord Chancellor (who did it himselte) to be complained of to the King, who immediately tooke Boare and told the whole Tragedy; whereof King Henry seemed to be sore offended, for vling a woman with such inhumane tortures. But such fauours had the Popes Chickens vnder the shroud of the Church and wing of this Monarch, that they feared not to follow the appeale of death, even vpon her that slept in his owne bosome, which was Queene Katherine Parr, espoused vnto him some three yeeres before, and whom (as this this Staates intellige doth confesse) he meane to have burned had be longer lived. For the truth is (saith hee) that the King sickness and death shortly ensuing was the chiefe cause of her escape; and the error of the Lord Chancellor Writheby, who let fall out of his busines, the Kings hand and commission for carrying her to the Tower gave occasion (the paper found and brought her) to goe and humble her selfe to the King (the principal occasion against her, was at Heretick Books, found in her closet, both brought to sent her by Anne Askew, whose of these matters were the Lady Herbert, Lady Jane, Lady Tyrrell, and others. Indeed it is true that by Gods providence such papers were let fall out of the Lord Chancellors bosome containing certain Articles against her, with a warrant to commit her to the Tower, whereunto the Kings hand was subscribed: which being found was presently brought unto the Queene, whereof the unexpected content so deeply touched her tender heart, that forthwith there fell into great fealaments, and a most heavy melancholy, and was in such danger of death, that the King came to visit her, having not gone forth of his Chamber of many dayes before; whereas she so rejoiced, as shee began to amend: and to acknowledge her like love and duty, the next night following, repaired to the Kings Bed-chamber, accompanied onely with the Lady Herbert her sister, and the Lady Jane the Kings niece, carrying the Candle before her, of whose presence the King seemed to be most desirous; and presently falling in talke of Religion, began to debate some question thereof with the Queene, demanding to haue her resolutions therein, but shee knowing that his nature was not to be croll, and the force of his legges to encrease his chollier, made him an-swere that for was a woman, accompanied with many imperfections, but his Majesty wife and iudicious, of whom shee much learne as of her Lord and Head, for so God hath appointed you (saith shee) the Supreme Head of vs all, of whom next unto him I will ever learne. Not so, by Saint Mary, said the King, you are become a Doe? or Kate to instruct vs, and not to be instructed by vs as often heretofore we have seene. I decide (saith shee) if your Majesty be as I conceive, I have bene mistaken in my meaning, who have ever held it propitious for a woman to instruct her Lord. And whereas I have heretofore held talke with your highnesse teaching Religion, it was to learne of your Majesty some excellent point which my selfe stood in doubt of: and sometimes to the end that you might with lesse griefe passe over this painful time of your unfitness, we herein if by my overmuch boldnes I have fau-lered in the latter, yet have I not done in the former, to my small benefit and comfort. And it is even so sweet heart (quoth the King) why then, are we friends, and so kissing her, gave her leave to depart. But the day drawne on for her apprehension, and the King disposed to take the ayre, sent for the Queene to walke in the Garden, himselfe accompanied onely with two Gentlemen, and shee with the three fore-said Ladies. Whenas suddenly the Lord Chancellor with forty of the Guard, came into the Garden, with purpose to haue apprehended and carried the Queene to the Tower; whose unexpected approach the King greatly mistook, and sternely beholding him, steps aside, saluting him with the names of knaue, foole, and beast, hiding himselfe out of presence. The Queene seeing the King chafed, but knew not the cause, indiscreetly by all means to pacifie his Majesty, and intreated for the Lord Chancellor, whose fault as shee thought and alleged, was rather through misimpression then will, and therefore, said shee, I will become an humble suitor for him unto your Highnesse. At whose saile (quoth the King) thou little knowest I Kate bene cailed the deserveth this grace at thy hands: of my word (sweet heart) hee hath bene true as at these words knoweth. But in following this tract of blood, flowed from the fontaine of the fixe Articles, wee have stepped over some other occurrences that happened somewhat before this time, unto which with thy patience, good Reader, we will retorne againe.

(114) King Henry by order of Parliament having assumed the Style and Title of King of Ireland, with the submission of most of the Irish Nobility, James his Nephew, King of Scotland, took it not well, for that, as Lately saith, a great part of Ireland, especially in the North, had been in possession of the Scottishmen for many hundred of yeeres before.
These discontents conceived, King Henry well perceived; and because hee would haue no ill will to nere him, that had so many enemies abroad, he sent unto King James that it would please him to repair unto the City of Yorke, where he would meet him, to conferre for the wealth of both the Realmes, which at first was granted, but vpon better aduise, vnac-complished, his Counsellors mooving the dangers, and his Clergy the feares, left their Religion should be changed to the offence of his confederates the Pope, the Emperour, and the French King.

(115) The vnkindnes growing from this small spark, was presently kindled into great flames, for Commissioners being sent from both Kingdoms, to view the limits of either Kingdome, they fell at odds about a small peece of ground, and from that took occasion of emulation and warres: to profecute which King Henry prepared an Armie, and sent them into Scotland vnder the Conduct of the Duke of Norfolke, accompanied with the Earles of Shrewsbury, Dorby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angus and Rat-land. These passing the English Marches, did much hurt in the Kingdome of Scotland. To withstand whom King James gathered a power, of five and thirty strong, and at Fallow more meane to haue hidden the Duke battell, which as that writer relate, was not then minded to doe, but made againe into England, and passing the water Tweed, sustained great losse by the courageous pursuit of the Lord Hunsly.
King James vpon a lusty courage meaning to repaire the Scots losses with the English spoiles, was very forward to follow the Duke into their Borders, but the Scottish Nobility wisely warning the danger of warre, by no means would either assent, or assist him out of his owne kingdome, affirming it honour sufficient, to haue forced the English backe with no little losse.

(116) King James discontented at his Nobles denials, made towards the Borders himselfe, whete, mouing the Lord Mareschall, Lord Warden of the west Borders, with many other men of speciall fauour and account, to invade England, whereunto they gaue their contents. These passing the River Esk, did some small damage vpon the Western Borderers, whereof Thomas ballard Dacres, and Luke of Mofgraue as Hollosted calls them, sent word to Thomas Wharston, Lord Warden for the King vpon the West Marches: But the Scots coming forward, they were forced to prepare for fight before the Lord Wharston could come, and out of their small company left a stand vpon the side of a hill.

(117) The Scots advanced forward with no little hope, were presently daunted with the sight of these men, and verily thought that the Lord Hunston had assembled his Charge, or that the Duke of Norfolke with a great Army were come to their relief, whereupon they began to confalt what was best to be done, and demanding who was depured Lieutenant by the King, Oliver Sinclair of no great parts nor honorable parentage, being lifted vp vpon the Shoulders of two Soldiers, shewed forth the Kings Commission, wherein himselfe was appointed their Generall, and whereat howsoever it was writte or read, the Lords took no little disdain that so many more worthy, honourable, and approved Captaines of the Field, should be led by this his Minion, but no Scrunt of Mars. In whole contempt, and for the indignation of their King, they suffered themselves to bee taken Prisoners, and willingly lost the daye.

fourth of November, at a place beyond Carlew, called Solow-moffe, where were taken Prisoners the Earles of Cassils and Glenearne, the Lords Macarrell, Flemming, Summerwell, Oliphant, and Gryll, Sir Oliver Sinclair, and others, to the number of one and twenty men of account, who were conveyed to London, and committed to the Tower. For griefe of which losse, and suspicion of his Nobility, King James fell into a melancholy Passion, which the birth of his new borne Princcle rather increased, then gave him any comfort, so as hee deceased the fourteenth day of December following, foregoing (saith Lefly) great troubles to follow in Scotland.

(119) Newes brought neere at one instant, of the death of King James, & birth of the Princcle his daughter. King Henry intended to doe that by the match of a marriage, which long had bene assayed by the sword of Mars: all things so conforing as it did, hee having one onely Sonne, then about five yeres of age, and Scotland no heire beside this new borne daughter, their yeeres suiting a consent for marriage, the whole Island offering both the joyner and dowry, and that which most moved, their chiefe Nobility in his owne hands, to be moulded for this designe, as if heaven it selfe had bid the banns.

(120) Thole Prisoners therefore which had remained in the Tower only two daies, upon the twenty one of December, hee sent for to Westminster, the Earles and Lords all suited in Gownes of blacke damask, suited with Cunnay, whereafter some words of friendly reproofe, they were bestowed among the English Nobility, who vfed them according to their estates: and the third day in Chriftmas were invited to the Court at Greenwich, where they went before the King to his Chappell, were royally scaffolded, and the motion then made for the establishing of peace, by the Continuation of the two Princes, whereunto the Scotch were as willing as the English, & proffered all forward assistance to have it accomplished. So that these Nobles were delivred without other ransome, and richly rewarded at their departure from Court.

(121) These returned into Scotland, declared what they had done, and so effectually followed the business, that in a Parliament assembled of the three Estates, the marriage was confirmed, and a peace proclaimed to continue betwixt the two Realmes the space of tenne yeeres, which agreements were sent into England by honourable Ambassadors, and there interchanprably sealed betwixt these Potent Estates. But Cardinal Beza Archbishop of Saint Andrewes, fearing lest Scotland would change the Church Orders, as England had done (the Bible already read in their owne language, and the Popes viced power called in Question, as then it began to be, by the fervent preaching of Frier Gualtero, to the great liking of most of the Lords) made some exceptions against the Earle Arreane the new chosen Governour, and second person in the Land, being neer-ly in blood to the young Queene. And the French King not liking this union with England, fought by all means to breake the same match to effect which, he sent the Earle of Lennox to perswade with the Governour, with great proffers and promises of assistance, but finding him faithfull vnto King Henry, presently made faction for the French, wherein hee drew the Queene mother, the Earles Huntly, Argyle, Montrose, Montrose, and many more Peeres, the Cardinall amongst them ever the chiefe.

(122) Earle Lennox thus growne into credite with the Queene mother, and made strong by her adherents that favoured the French, presently claimed to be Governour of Scotland, being the second person of degree in the Realme, and withall to have the custody of the young Queene, who with her mother were forthwith taken from Linlithgow under the charge of the Governour Arreane, and brought vnto Strueling strongly guarded, with the continual presence of the Lords, Lennox, Erskine, Flemming, and Ruthwen, least Queene Mary should be conveyed into England vnto King Henry. These violent contries, caused great Emulations among the Scotch Nobility, each of them sding as their affections were ruled, but lastly agree to let the Crowne on their young Queenes head: prepared for the solemnity, whereunto all the Lords came, excepting thole that stood for England, and from them the Govern-our with much adoe was drawne to be present at the Coronation: but that accomplished, and the three affaires consilied upon, it was agreed that the French Kings suite should be snoured, and that the Earle Arreane should be Governour still, whereas Earle Lennox conceived such displeasure, as he became wholly for King Henry, & joined himselfe with the Earles of Angus, Glenearne, and Cassils, the Lords, Macarrell, Sum-merwell, Gray, and others that stood with the English for the match with Prince Edward.

(123) King Henry then hearing what was done, and intended, sent presently into Scotland to demand the Custody of the young Queene, and that certaine Scotch Noblemen might be appointed to gnrde her in England, untill shee came to yeeres of consent, according to Covenants formerly concluded, which no waies would be granted, and thereupon hee prepared an Army thitherward, under the Conduct of Lord Edward Semmer Earle of Hertford Lieutenant General by Land, accompanied with the Earle of Sherburne, and a Fleet of two hundred saile by Sea, whereof Sir John Dudley, Vicount Lisle was Ad-mirall.

(124) To the aide of the Scots the Popes holie-nesse was very forward, who sent them the Patriarch of Fenice as his Legate, & Orator, to perswade their Resolutions, with whom the French King sent Monsieur la Roche, and Monfieur Menager, to lead them to fight, and fifty thousand Crownes of the Sun, to sus-taine the Charge: with manition worth ten thousand Crownes more. It seemed by Lefly that part of this silver fell into the Earle Lennox his hand, and that therewith hee made head against the Governour, but not able to match him, sent vnto King Henry for aide, with proffer of his service against the French side, which so well was accepted of Henry, as hee made him his Nephew, by giving the Lady Margaret his sisters daughter to be his wife.

(125) The English thus seceded with this va-looked for Alliance, Cardinal Beza thought good to binde all to the Governour, who with the Anthority of the Queene Dowager proclaimed Lennox an Enemy to the State. But in the meane while the Admirall of England was entered the Firth, and at new Hauen landed his men, where joining his to the land Service, they altogether marched thence towards Leith, him selfe leading the Vawed, Sherburne the Rereward, and the Lord Lieutenant the maine Battell. These coming to Leith, spoiled the Town, and thence to Edinburgh, burnt the City, and wasted the Country for seven miles about, this done they firre vpon Haddington, and Dunbarre, and then the whole Army returned vnto Burwick.

(126) Whilst things thus passed in Scotland, and the maine purpose resting in suspence, King Henry well knew where the greatest rub did lie in his way, which was the French King, the chiefeft Abet-ter of the Scots, whom hee euer vpheld, to hold him tacke at home, least otherwise hee should tug with France for his owne right. And therefore having joined with the Emperour against the French, sent his Herald, Garter, King at Armes, to demand certaine covenants, which if hee refused, to proclaime de-viance vnto open warres, but hee not suffered to doe his message to the King, returned, and Henry prepared an expedition into France, wherein hee imploied the Dukes of Normandie and Burgundie, the Earles of Armouille, Orleans and Savoy, the Lords, Fuill, Grey, Ferriers, Montmorency, and Saint-John, besides many other feruicable Knights, and Sir John Dudley appointed high Admirall for the Seas. Of these some iointed with the Emperials, and shewed their value in the siege of Maitell.

(127) The Duke of Stafford in the meane while flauke downe his Standards on the East side of Bolignoy, and with many sharpe skirmishes, entred the baie Towne, which siege King Henry himselfe in person seconded, who having passed the Seas from England, vpon the first & twentieth of Iuly, encamped before Bolignoy on the East side, whence his Canons so rent the Walls and Bulwarks, as their mounted tops lay vpon the Ground, and his great mortar peeces were discharged with so skillfull a Compasse, that their bullets falling downe right, beate all buildings downe vpon the Enemies heads. Whereby (saith Slendene) in short time he got that, which neither his Father, nor the Kings in former times could neuer weare. For thereupon the Town was surrendered and cleared of the French soldiours, women and children.

(128) The King like a Conquerour with his sword borne before him entred the Gate, where the Duke of Stafford presented him with the keys of the Towne, the Trumpets still sounding, and nothing wanting that might applaud his fame. The Towne thus wonne, the English meant still to keep for the strengthening whereof, the King commanded the faire Church of Saint Maries to be taken downe, and in the same place, a mount to be raised for the planning of Ordnance, to annoy any siege. But being thus busied in Bolignoy affaires, the Emperour without his knowledge or consent came to a peace with the French King, whereto King Henry was sore displeased, and the sooner left France, leaving Sir John Dudley Lord Lisle, his deputy in Bolignoy, and landed at Dover the first day of October, to his great honor and ioy of his Subjects.

(129) The French King chafed with this late and great losse, fought to trie fortune in further attempts, and that not onely for the recovery of Bolignoy (which with twenty thousand well appointed he assailed) but also in assailing the English dominions, as the Ile of Higle and those parts of Sussex that lay vpon the Seas, though with losse of many Captaynes and thousands of Souldiers, that neuer returned to tell him what intertainment they had: as likewise in sending aide vnto Scotland, where Montfieur Montgomery of the Order of France, with 5000 strong, entred to maintain the breach betwixt them and K. Henry, which was so followed on both parts, as the English making a Roade towards Greenworth, got praille for their valour, but reproch for their impoles, and the Scots renowned for killing the Lord Essex, Lord Warren of the East-Marches, with many other Capitaynes in defence of their Country.

(130) Hereupon an Army of twelue thousand strong was sent into Scotland, whereof the Earle of Hertford was General: with these he foraged the Borders before him, and burnt many Townes in the Middle-Marches, with Kilsey & Coldingham Abbey, the French not halting to stay the incursion, lay still, and let them (vnfought with) depart for England.

(131) But the watres removed againe into France, the King came with a great power came to victuall a Fort built neere vnto Bolignoy, to impeach which, the Earle of Surrey, then Lieutenant of the Towne made forth, but was discomfited in the enterprize, and Sir Edward Pymony Captaine of a Band flaine, with fiftene other Capitaynes, besides many Officers and Common Souldiers. These Princes was in these violent proceedings, became very fearful least they would grow to the Common hurt of Christendome, and therefore many other potentates, whereof the Emperour was first, solicited these Kings vnto a peace, which the sooner was heard and imbraced, for that they were both of them old, and King Henry diseased in body. Commissioners therefore appointed exterraine Articles were agreed vpon: the first thereof was, that the French King should pay vnto King Henry, eight hundred thousand Crownes in eight yeres space, and then to reenter vpon Bolignoy, but in the meane time it to remaine vnder the English: to accomplish which peace Montfieur Danche high Admirall of France, was sent into England; and Sir Thomas Chyneys Lord Warde of the Cinque Ports, to be the Kings Agent at the Fort, for the baptizing of the Dolphin new borne daughter.

(132) Notwithstanding these Compliments, the light of Bolignoy was a great lode in the French mens eyes, inasmuch that Montfieur Chastell Captaine of Montfleur, beganne to make a new Bastillon neere vnto the Towne, even in the very mouth of the River, which the Lord Grey of Wilde perceiving certified the King, what inconuenience would happen if that were made strong, and the same disuised at the Counsell-Table, in passed with one voice that the Peace with France was not to be intending, notwithstanding this French attempt: to which end a prohibition drawne, wherewith King Henry alio fit his hand, that no let should be made against Chastell in his Fort. Howbeit the King commanded Sir Thomas Palmer (employed in this buisnes) to hid the Lord Grey to impeach the new worke, and to far so much as was raised thereof vnto the Earth. This commission read with the report of Command to the Contrary, the Counsell of State, thought it most meete to follow their instructions in writing, lest the words might either be misdelivered or mistaken. But the Lord Grey causing the messengers words to be writ, and subscribed with all their hands that were present at the report; suddenly and vnlooked for, came to the Fort, and in foure houres space call downe, what had beene in raising three moneths before, which when the King heard off, he asked his Counsellors what they thought of this, that Chastell garden was call downe: amongst whom one of them answered, the deer thereof was worthy to looke his head. I had rather (saith the King) looke a dozen of such hendes as thine is, then his that had done the deed, and immediately let the Lord Grey his pardon with many great thanks.

(133) But now the date of his time almost run; and he preparing towards the way of all flesh, the great and faire Church of the Grey Friars London, lately suppressed by himselfe, he caused againe to be opened, and to be made a Parish Church, giuing the reuerences thereof vnto the Cite of London towards the reliefe of their poore, wherunto he gaue five hundred Markes yearly of Lands for euer to maintain Gods diuine seruice and the said Churches reparations, within whose walles we finde this often written, This is Christs Church founded by King Henry the first.

(134) And his sickness increasing to the great danger of life he prepared himselfe to make his Will, wherein howsoever titles had been vnabled in Parliaments, he ordained his three children to succede each after others, for want of other Issue: One thousand markes he commanded to be giuen to the poore, and to twelue poore Knights at Windsore each of them twelue pence a day for euer, every yere a long Gowne of white cloth, the Garter imbrodered vpon the breast, wherein was placed the Croffe of Saint George, and a Mantle of red cloth to be worn thereupon, ordaining for his Executors in the minority of Prince Edward, these heere vnder named,

- 1 Thomas Crommer, Archbishop of Canterbury.
- 2 Thomas Wriethesley Lord Chancelier.
- 3 William Paulet Knight of the Order.
- 4 Lord Saint John Great Master of the Household.

King Henrie
died.

And in great penitency for his finnes, died vpon Thursday the twenty eight day of Ianuary, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 1546. when hee had reigned thirty seven yeere, nine moneths, and five daies, shad liued fifty five yeres, five months, & five daies, whose body with great solemnity was buried at Windsore vnder a most costly and lately Tombe begonne in Copper and gault, but neuer finished, in the inclosures of whose Grates is curiously cast this inscription. HENRICVS OCTAVVS REX ANGLIÆ, FRANCIAE, DOMINVS HIBERNIAE, FIDELI DEFENSOR with what cost and rate this his Monument was intended, is manifested by a Manuscript taken from the true modell thereof, which I receiued from that industrious Herald, Master Nicholas Charles Lunsay, and for the great magnificence is worthy here to be inscribed.

The manner of the Tombe to be made for the Kings Grace at Windsore.

First, the pavement wherevpon the Tombe shall stand, shall be of Orientall stone: That is to say, of Alabaster, Porphie, Serpentine, and other stones of diuers colours, as in the patterne sheweth.

Item, vpon the same Pavement shall be two great steps vnder all the worke of like Orientall stones.

Item, the Basement of the Pillers shall be of white Marble with Angels holding betwene them Crownes or Garlands guilt, and white Marble as more plainly sheweth in the Patterne.

Item, aboue the said Basement and Angels, shall be all the old Testament, that is to say, xiiij. Images in the xiiij. Calcements of the same two Pillers of the Prophets, and all the Pillers which shall be xvi. shall be of stones Serpentine, Porphie and Alabaster, and other fine Orientall stones, of such colours as is shewed in the Patterne; and the foote of every pillar, and also the head shall be of Brasse. And every Prophet shall haue an Angell sit at his foote, with Scripture of the name of his Prophet, and aboue oer the head of the same shall bee the story of his Prophet: in euery of which Story shall bee at least viij. or x. figures.

Item, aboue all the same Pillers shall bee another Basement of white Marble, with a partition being made of such fine Orientall stones as the Pillers bee, wherein shall bee written such Scripture as please you.

Item, aboue the same Basement shall be the Story of the new Testament, that is to wit, with the Images of the Apostles, the Euangelists and the foure Doctors of the Church, and every Image shall haue sitting at his foote a little child with a Scripture of the name of his Image, and a little Basket full of red and white Roses, which they shall shew to take in their hands, and cast them downe off the Tombe and oer the Pavement, and the Roses that they shall cast oer the Tombe shall bee enamelled and guilt, and the roses that they cast oer the Pavements shall be of fine Orientall stones of white and red.

Item, behinde all the same Images of the new Testament round shall be made in brasse and guilt all the life of Iesus Christ from the natiuity to his ascension, and it shall be so clearly and perfectly made, that the Mytery of Christ's life to his ascension shall plainly appere.

Item, aboue the said new Testament and Images thereof, and aboue the said life of Christ, shall bee a Quire of x. Angels standing vpon a Basement of white Marble, with great Candlesticks in their hands haning lights in them shewing to honour and reuerence the same Tombe.

Item, all these foresaid figures, stories and ornaments shall be made to garnish and orase the two Pillers of the Church betwene which the Tombe shall be set.

Item, betwene the said two great Pillers of the Church thus garnished, shall be a Basement of white Marble of the heighs of the Basement of the Pillers, and therein the Epitaph of the King and Queene, with letters of gold, of such Scriptures as yee desire.

Item, vpon the same Basement shall bee made two Tombes of blacke touch, that is to say, on either side one, and vpon the said Tombes of black Touch shall be made the Image of the King and Queene on both sides, not as death, but as persons sleeping, because to shew that famous Princes leauing behinde them great fame, their names neuer doe die, and shall lie in roiall Apparels after the antique manner.

Item, oer the right hand, oer both the sides of the same Tombe shall be an Angell which shall hold the Kings Armes, with a great Candellicke, haning as it were light on it as a Lampe, and in like manner shall be an other Angell holding the Queenes Armes on the left hand with a like Candellicke.

Item, on the right hand and left hand on both the sides oer the said Images of the King and Queene, shall be two Angels shewing to the people the bodies of the King and Queene holding aboue their Heades veiles of gold, and the Crownes of the King and Queene on their hands.

Item, betwene the said two Tombes of blacke Touch and the said Angell oer the King & Queene shall stand an high Basement like a Sepulchre, and on the sides whereof shall be the story of Saint George, and oer height of the Basement shall bee made an Image of the King on Horsebacke, liuelie in Armor like a King after the Antique manner shewing in countenance and looking on the said two Images lying on the said Tombes.

Item, on the right hand and left hand of the said two Tombes shall bee foure Pillers of the foresaid Orientall stones, that is to say, on either side two Pillers, and vpon every Pillar shall bee a like Basement of white Marble with paritions for Scriptures as shall be aboue the other Pillers. And on the same foure Basements of the said Pillers shall bee made foure Images, two of Saint Iohn Baptist, and two of Saint George, with foure little children by them casting roses, as is aforesaid.

Item, oer the said Image of the King on Horsebacke shall bee made an Arch triumphall, of white Marble wrought within, and about it, and vpon the same Arch, in manner of a Calcement of white Marble garnished with like Orientall Stones of diuers colours, as the pattern sheweth, and on the two sides of the said Calcement shall be made and set of brasse guilt, the story of the life of Saint Iohn Baptist, and one height of the said Calcement shall bee made five steps, euery one more then oer downward, of like Orientall stones, as the said Pillers shall shew.

Item, on the foure corners of the said Calcement shall shall be made the Images of the foure Cardinal ver-gues hauing such Candlestickes in their hands as is aboue said.

Item, on the toppe of the highest step of the said five steps on the one side shall be an Image of the Father, hauing in his left hand the Soule of the King, and blessing with his right hand, with two Angels holding abroad the Mantle of the Father on either side.

Item, in like wise shall be made on the other side the said Image of the Father, hauing the soule of the Queene in his left hand, blessing with his right hand with like Angels.

The height of the same worke from the Father vnto the Pavement shall be xxviij. foote.

Item the breadth and largenes of the said worke shall be xx. foote, and the Pillers of the Church in greenes, v. foote : so fo the largenes of the said worke, from the veterano ft part of the two great Pillars shall be xx. foote.

Item, euery of the Images of the xiiij. Prophets, shall containe euery Image .v. foote in length, and the Angels shall containe two foote and a halfe in length.

Item, euery of the xx. Pillers shall containe in length x. foote.

Item, euery of the Images of the Apostles, Euan-gelists and Doctors shall containe in length .v. foote and the Angels as is aboue said.

Item in likewise euery of the xx. Angels of the quire shall containe in length two foote and a halfe, and in likewise the Images of the Children two foote and a halfe.

Item, the foure Images of St. John Baptist and St.
George and all the figures of the father and Angels on the .v. steps shall be .v. foote.

Item, the foure Images of the King and the Queen shall be of the Statute of a man and woman, and the foure Angels by them of the stature of a man euery one.

Item, the Image of the King on Horseback with his Horse shall be of the whole stature of a goodly man and large Horse.

Item, there shall be a xxxviij. figures, xiiij. Stories, and all of Beasts gilty, as in the paterne appeareth.

(131) This magnificent Monarch was of presence Maiestical, and of Personage more then ordinary tall, faire of Complexion and Corpulent of boddy, very wise and very well learned, of a sudden and ready speech, in youth very prodigall, and in his age very liberrall, pleasant and affable, but not to be delayed with, bolde in attempting, and euer thirstie of potent glory: an expert Souldier, and fauouring such as were active or fruiteable, according to the then vsual saying, King Henrie loues a man: and indeed somewhat too wel the delights with women, as by his many wives heere ensuing, may well appeare.

His Wives.

(136) Katherine the first wife to King Henry was the daughter of For demandy the first King of Spain, and widow dowager of Prince Arthur his elder brother, as hath bene said: she was married vnto this King the third of Iune: and first of his Raigne, the yeere of saluation 1509. being solemnely crowned with him vpon the twenty fourth day of the same, and was his wife about twenty yeeres, and then di-uorced from him by the sentence of the Archbishop of Canterbury: liued three yeeres after by the name of Katherine Dowager. Shee decaied at Kimbulton in the Conney of Huntington the eight of Ianuary, and yeere of Christ 1535. and lieth interred on the North-side of the quire in the Cathedral Church of Peterburm vnder a hearle of Blacke Saye, hauing a white Crosse in the middelt.

(137) Anne, the second wife of King Henry, was the second daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earle of Wiltshire and Ormond. Shee was solemnly at Wind- fore created Marchionesse of Pembroke, the first of September and twenty foure of his Raigne, hauing one thousand pound giuen her by yeere, to maintaine her estate. Shee was married vnto King Henry in his Closet at White-Hall, vpon the twenty fift day of Ianuary, and yeere of Christ 1513, being the foure and twentieth of his Raigne, and was Crowned with all due obseruances, at Westminster vpon Whit- sunday the first of Iune, where the Crowne of Saint Edward was let vpon her head, the scepter of God deliuered into her right hand, and the Lincy rodde with the Doue into her left. Shee was his wife three yeeres, three monethes and twenty five daies, when being cut off by the sword the nineteenth of May, her body was buried in the Quire of the Chappell in the Tower, leauing her accouled fame to bee confirmed as affections best possit the vncharitable minded, and her bed to bee possit of a vertuous Lady.

(138) Isabel, the third wife of King Henry, was the daughter of John Semur Knight, and sister to Lord Edward Semur, Earle of Hertford, and Duke of Sum- merfet. Shee was married vnto him the twentieth of May, euen the next day after the beheading of Queen Anne, and the twenty eight of his Raigne.
Shee was his wife one yeere, sixe monethes and twenty foure daies, and died in Child-bed the nineteenth of October, to the great griefe of the King, who not onely removed from the place, but kept him selfe private, and wore the Garment of mourning euen in the Festiual time of Christmas, her body was solemnely conaied to Windsore the eight of Noiem-ber following, where she was interred in the middelt of the Quire of the Church within the Castell.

(139) Anne the fourth wife of King Henry and sister to William Duke of Cleue was married vnto him the sixth of Iannary in the thirty one yeere of his Raigne, the yeere of Grace, 1541. shee was his wife sixe moneths, after which time certain Lords of the vpper House of Parliament came into the assembly, and alledged cause for which that marriage was vnlawfull, whereupon shee was diuorced, and by Sentence enacted, that shee should no more be taken for Queene, but should be called the Lady Anne of Cleue. See remained in England long after the Kings death, though small mention is made of her by any of our Writers, only we finde that she accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London at the solemnizing of Queene Maries Coronation.

(140) Katherine the fifth wife of King Henry the eight, was the daughter of Edmund, and Neece vnto Thomas Howard his brother, Duke of Norfolk.
Shee was married vnto him the eight of August and yeere of Grace 1540. being the thirte two of his Raigne, at Hampton Court, and continued his Queene the space of one yeere, sixe moneths and foure daies, and for her vnchalle life was attained by Parliament, and for the same beheaded within the Tower of London the twelfth of February and her body buried in the Chancell of the Chappell by Queene Anne Bullen.

(141) Katherine the sixth and last wife of King Henry was the daughter of Sir Thomas Perre of Ken- dall and sister to Lord William Perre Marquesse of Northampton, shee was first married to John Newill, Lord Latimer, and after his decaise, vpon the twelfth of Iune married vnto the King at Hampton Court, the yeere of Saluation, 1541. and thirte fise of his Raigne: Shee was his wife three yeeres, sixe months and fise daies, and furnishing him, was againe married vnto Thomas Semur Lord Admiral of England, vnto whom she bare a daughter, but died in the same Child-bed, the yeere of Grace, 1548.

His Issue.

(142) Henrie the first sonne of King Henry by Queene Katherine his first wife, was borne at Rich- mond in Surry vpon the first of Ianuary, and the first

of his fathers Raigne, whole Godfathers at Font were the Lord Cramer, Archbishop of Canterburie, and the Earle of Surrey: his Godmother, Lady Katherine Countesse of Devonshire, daughter to King Edward the fourth. This Prince lived not fully two months but died in the same place wherein he was borne, vpon the two and twentieth of February, and his body with all due obsequies buried in Westminster.

(143) A sonne not named was borne vnto King Henric by Lady Katherine his first Queene in the month of November, and the sixth yeere of his Raigne, who lived not long, and therefore no further mention of him can be made: the deaths of these Princes King Henric tooke as a punishment from God, for so he alleged it in the publicke Court held in Blacke-frices London, they being begot on his owne brothers wife.

(144) Marie the third child and first daughter of King Henric by Queene Katherine his first wife, was borne at Greenwich in Kent, the eighteenth of February in the yeere of Christs humanity, 1518. and the eighth of his Raigne. Shee was by the direction of her mother brought vp in her Childe-hood by the Countesse of Salisbury her neere kinswoman, for that as some thought, the Queene wished a marriage betwixt some of her sons and the Princeesse, to strengthen her Title by that Alliance into Turke, if the King should die without issue Male. In her young yeeres shee was fued to be married with the Emperour, the King of Scots, and the Duke of Orleans in France, but all these failings, and shee succeeding her brother K. Edward in the Crowne, at the age of thirte fixe yeeres, marched with Philip King of Spain, to the great dislike of many, and small content to her selfe, hee being imployed for the most part beyond the Seas, for griefe whereof and the losse of Calais, shee lastly fell into a burning fever, that cost her life.

(145) Elizabeth the second daughter of King Henric, and first child by Queene Anne his second wife, was borne at Greenwich, vpon Sunday the sixteenth of September, the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1534. and twenty five of her Fathers Raigne, who with due solemnities was baptized the Wednesday following, Archbishop Cramer, the old Dutche of Norfolke, and the old Marchionesse of Dorset being the witnesses at the Font, and the Marchionesse of Exeter at the confirmation: Shee succeeded her sister Queene Marie in the Monarchy of England, and was for wisdom, vertue, piety, and lustre, not one-lie the Merour of her Sexe, but a pattern for Government to all the princes in Christendome: whose name I may not mention without a dutifull remembrance, and whole memory vnto me is most deare, amongst the many thousands that received extraordinary fauours at her gracious and most liberal hand.

(146) Another man-child Queene Anne bare vnto King Henry, though without life vpon the nine and twentieth of January, and twenty seuen of his Raigne, to the no little griefe of the mother, some dislike of the King, as the sequel of her accusation and death did shortly confirme.

(147) Edward the last child of King Henry, and first of Queene Jane his third wife, was borne at Hampstan Court, the twelfth of October, the yeere of Grace, 1537. and twenty nine of the Kings Raigne, being cut out of his mothers wombe as it constantly affirmed, like as Iulius Caesar is said to haue been: his Godfathers at the Font, was Thomas Cramer, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolk, his sister Lady Mary being Godmother, sixth Grafton: Sixe daies after his birth he was created Prince of Wales, and at the death of his Father, succeeded him in all his Dominions, of whom more followeth hereafter.

His Naturall Issue.

(148) Henric Fitz-Rois the naturall sonne of King Henric the eight was begotten of the Lady Talboste called Elizabeth Blount, and borne in the Mannor of Blackmore in Essex about the tenth yeere of his Raigne: at the age of fixe yeeres he was created Earle of Nottingham and in the one and twentieth of his Fathers Raigne vpon the eighteenth of Iune in the Kings Pallace of Brudenell was made Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Lord Warden of the East, West, and Middle-Marches against Scotland, and Lieutenant Generall of all the parts of England Northward, he was a Prince very forward in Martiall Activities, of Good literature and knowledge in the tongues, vnto whom the learned Antiquary Ieland dedicated a Booke: He married Marie daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall and Lord high Treasurer of England, with whom he liued not long, but died at Saint James by Westminster the two and twentieth of Iuly in the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1536. and was buried at Triningham in Suffolke.

Died in 1536.

He tempestuous stormes in the Raigne of this King Henric the eight, and the violent deluge raised against the Church-state of his times, bare downe so many religious strong foundations, and were the destruction of so many beautifull Monasteries, as the onely relation of their numbers and names, would haue much interrupted the narration of his history. Wherefore to retaine their memorials (though their walls are laid waste) apell for the reuerence we owe vnto venerable Antiquity, as for the example of their Founders holynesse, we haue inserted a Catalogue of their names, orders, and true valuations, as in the origmall Booke thereof taken by Commission, and giuen vnto the King, we finde them downe, though at their dissolutions their values were somewhatly and farre vnder rated. Some Founders, and times of foundations we want, the rest, to breuifnesse, to auoid prolixity we haue set downe in this present following

CHAPTER.

A CATALOGVE OF THE RELIGIOUS HOUSES WITHIN THE REALME OF ENGLAND AND VVales, with many their Orders, Founders, and Values, most of them being suppressed by King Henry the eight. Together with such other sacred places, as either then were by him left standing, or since have been created.

Since in this precedent Table, wee have laide to the Readers view a great part of this Kings ill, the waste of so much of Gods reueneue (howsoever abused) let him not holde it in curiosity, out of reason, since it may in charity fall well in sequence by sitting downe the Churches either erected, or restored by him, or by him (which is the now state of our Clergy) continued to redeem his memory blemished by the former error, from the vulgar aspersion of sacrilegious impietie.

This King after the dissolution of the Religious houses, erected these sixe Bishopsricks, to witte, Westminster, Chester, Peterborough, Oxford, Bristol, and Gloucester, whereof the five last are in esse, and at the same time he erected also these Cathedrall Churches here after mentioued, wherein he founded a Deane, and the number of Prebends following, viz.

EDWARD THE SIXTH OF THAT NAME, KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c, THE FIFTIE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS LIFE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

CHAPTER XXII.

AD. 1547.

EDWARD the sixth of that Name, and onely sonne living vnto King Henry the eight, was borne at his Mannor of Hampton-Court in Middlesex, the twelfth of October, the yeere of saluation, 1547. and sixe dayes after being the eighteenth of the same moneth, hee was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester: his birth was ioyfull vnto the King and Commons; but the death of his mother, the vertuous Queen Jane, brought immediat sorrow vnto both, whose womb was cut (as some haue affirmed) to the sauing of his, but losse of her owne life, vpon whose death these elegant verses were writ;

*Phoenix Iana laet nato Phoenix, dolendum

Here lies the Phoenix Lady Jane, whose death a Phoenix bore, O graue, two Phoenixes at one time, together neuer were.

(3) Nine yeeres and od monethes hee was ver-tuously trained vp in the life of his faiber, and at his death appointed the first of his heires, and for want of issue (it is so chanced) Mary, and shee failing, Elisabeth to succeed in his throne. for as Henry with Solomon was blame-worthy for women, so left hee but one sonne and two daughters, as the other in Scripture is said to haue done: Solomon had Rebekham a foole and vnforsanate, his daughters, but obscure, and both of them Subiects, but Henry was more happy in Edward his sonne, who proued another young Salomon himselfe, and his sisters both Soueraignes of an Imperiall Crowne.

(3) He beganne his raigne the twentyeight of January, in the yere of Christ 1546, and the last of that moneth was proclaimed King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith; and supreme Governour of these Chorches, with other his rightfull Titles to his Imperiall Stiles belonging. And on the twentieth of February following being Shrove-Sunday, was Crowned at Westminster with all due Solemnities.

(4) His Counsellors were appointed by his sickle Father as we haue said, and Protector ouer his Minoritie and Realmes (by consent of the Nobles) was ordained his Vncle Edward Lord Seymer Earle of Hertford and Duke of Somerset, brother vnto Queene Jane, who thereupon gaue the young King the Order of Knight-hood, and the King immediately did the like vnto the Lord Chancellor of London.

(5) His first busines was to establish Gods seruice, who had established him in the Throne, and as another Isaiah in godly zeale, destroyed Idolatry, by pulling downe images in England, as that King in Israhel did the Altars of Baalim, fought the Saluation of his Subiects, by sending forth Preachers to instruct the people, as Isaiah did the Leuites the teachers of Israel vnto their charges: brought the Bible in a knowen language to be read in the Church, as he did the Arke into the Temple of the Lord, commanded the ancient and true vie of the Sacrament in both kindes as Isaiah commanded the Passouer both to be kept and celebrated in Ierusalem, and in all things proued another Isaiah indeed.

(6) And as Edward was busied in setting forth Gods glorie, so the Protector and Councell were careful for the State of the Realme, and especially for their Kings marriage with Mary the young Queen of Scotland, vnto which a Parliament at Edinburgh had consented in Anno 1543, and for confirmation thereof had sent into England, William Earle of Gloucester, Sir George Douglas, Sir William Hamilton and Sir James Leirmond, Scottish Knights, Ambassadors, vnto King Henry deceased, betwix whom the contracts were sealed interchangeably as we haue said.

(7) And now by the Connell of England was thought most fit to be sought after, and consummated, for the wealth and peace of the whole Iland: wherefore they published their desires to that end, in an Epistle sent to the Scottish Nobilitie, directed vnto them by the Lord Protector; wherein they were remembered of the many incursions, roades, and Spoiles, committed and done, vpon either Kingdome through their continual hostilities, and warres: shewing like-wise the necesse of language, lineaments, and conditions of the Nations; inhabiting the same Iland, and therefore a most sure token (as they tooke it) to be defended from one and the same Originally vying Gods providence, that had taken away all the Male-Princes of Scotland, leauing them only one daughter; and in England, only one sonne vnto King Henry among his many wices. Their Princes themselves for yeeres, qualities, and magnificence, fitly ordained to contract the vniou of Peace: alleging that England sought neither the preheminece nor the cruquency of Scotland, but rather desired an equality both in state and government; and to that end offered to take the name of Britaine indifferently to both, though dishonorable to themselves, in bercauing their Nation of the glorie achieved, in many of their victories. These words withstanding, the Scottish perished to bestow their young Queene another way.

(8) Whereupon the Protector in person, vnder-tooke an expedition into Scotland, accompanied with the Earle of Warwick, the Lords Durres, and Grey of Wilton, many Knights, and a most warlike army of Souldiers. Edward Lord Clinton Admiral of the Fleet was appointed to Sea, and Sir William Woodhouse made his Vice-admirall: these meeting at Berwick set forth into Scotland, declaring by sound of Trumpet the cause of their coming, with profers of peace to all such of that Nation, as would aduance the marriage betwixt their two Princes, according to Courments already concluded vpon.

(9) The Governour of Scotland hearing newes of many Castles surrendered and surprisde, and fires daily encreasing by augmented reports, commanded his Heraldes with all possible diligence, to passe through all the part of the Realme, and the first Cryse to be borne wheresoever they came, a Cullome to be heard anciently vied in greatest extremity, and only then after this manner, two fire Brands let a Crosse were carried vpon the point of a spear, with Proclamation of the eminent danger, calling for aide, assigning the time and place, when and whither they were to resort: yet there be that say, It was a painted red Crosse set vp for certaine daies in the Field of that Barony, whereunto the aide should come: and those that refused, being aboute sixteene, and vnder sixty were accounted traitours, and their Land confiscated to the King. This ancient mulier the Governour commanded, appointing them a day to be at Northburgh in defence of their liberties and young Princes life: which presently stroke such regard to their hearts, that thither they strove who should be first, and pitched their Standards euen in the face of the Enemy.

(10) Many warlike enterprises were attempted betwixt them, many prisoners taken, and stout Souldiers slaine, vpon the Scots part the Lord Hamely by a fall from his horse lost his life, & his sonne with one Marshall and sixe other Gentlemen taken prisoners. Of the English were hurt Henry Fane, and Bartholomew Frenchman: Balmer, Gower, and Crouch, three Captaines of the light horsemen were taken prisoners: all which so happened before the day of great Battell.

(11) Whilst these things proceeded, and either part played vpon the aduantage, Earle Huntly of Scotland sent a Herald and Trumpet vnto England, Protector, with profers of Complate, either twenty to twenty, ten to ten, or in single fight themselves man to man, which surely was honorable, the Scots having aduantage for number, and Charitable for the saving of Christian blood: but their persons vnequal in regard of his place, that demand was denied, and profers made for the battell: which happened euen the next day following, being the tenth of September and the last of the weeke.

(12) The place where the English lay encamped, was vpon the Bankes of Edinburgh Frith, wherein their Ships floated to further the Land seruice, and those seeking the aduantage of a hill called Pinkie-clowbe, halted therewithal beimes in the morning; the Scottish thinking they had fled to their Ships, made the like halt to impeach their March, their Armie they diuided into three Batails, the Vanguard whereof was led by the Earle of Angus, the reargate by the valiant Earle Huntly, and in the great Battell, was the Governour with the Earle of Argyle, and many other of the Scottish Nobility.

(13) These eager of spoile, and filled with hope, halted furiously forward, without all feare or any good Order, and breathlesse, almost passed ouer the River Eide, presenting therein the expectation of the enemy, but being within danger of those, the English Fleet from the Roade let freely fly among a wing of the Irish-Archers, slaying many, with such terror to the rest, as hardly could they be gotten for to go forward, which endangered them more. The Scottish Armie thereupon removed somewhat Southward, seeking to get the higher ground with aduantage both of Sonne and winde, the desire whereof caused them lieke to regard the helpe of horse, but for halfe drew their great Ordinance therewithal only by maine strength of men.

(14) The English Captaines perceiving what the Scottish intended, and that now no skirmish but a Battell must be undergone fell to Consultation, being mounted in their saddles, where with such resolutions they departed alonder, that John Earle of Warwick, Lord Marshall of the field, desired the Protector to be good unto his wife and Children, if on this part things went not well with him. By this time the Armies were at point to joine battell, in the place called Edmundsmeade neere unto Muskeburgh, where the Master of the English Ordinance had mounted two Canons neere unto the top of the hill. The Scottish came forward, faster then an ordinary Marche, their pikemen thicke ranged together, bearing broad Bucklers in their left hands.

(15) At the first encounter Captain Shelley Lieutenant of the band of bulwers: Captain Karliffe brother to the Lord Fitwater, with many Gentlemen of name and account, were slaine, and the Lord Grey of Wilton General of the Horsemen, dangerously hurt in the mouth with a Pike: and indeed such was the fury of the Scots first encounter, that the English horsemen were forced backe, and in retiring ranne through, and bare downe a part of their owne footemen, to their great hate: when their Kings Standard (borne by Sir Andrew Flammoche) was laid fast hold on by the Scottish, and had not that Knights strength bene the more, and his horse the better, himselfe had bene slaine, and the Standard lost, which notwithstanding was graiped so fast, that the Scots bare away the Nether end of the Staffe to the barrill.

(16) The Canons from the hill, plained fore vpon the Scotts, and so did the Ordinance out of the English Fleete, whose terrible noise and smoke, filled the Armies with furious Cries, and darkened the day as with the Clouds of night: The retreat of the Protector Horsemen, disordering their fellows (as is said) gave signes vnto the Scots of a present victory, who now vpon a forward Courage disarmed themselves for halt, and fell vpon the disbanded English, who presently by their leaders were brought into Array, and fiercely pressed forward vpon the vanguard of the enemy, their advantage the more, for that the Scots wanted loth to answer their violence: which caused them in halfe confusedly to retire towards their great Battell: and those misdeeming the day had bene lost, turned their backs and fled: the chafe was followed almost five miles, wherein the Lord Fleming with sundry men of note were slaine: Bishop Leslie recordeth nine by name, besides ten thousand of their souldiers that therein lost their liues, and prisoners taken, about a thousand persons, the chiefe whereof was the Earle of Hamly, Chancellour of Scotland, the Lord Resler, Hobby, Hamilton Captaine of Dunbarre, the Master of Sampole, the Lord Wimmer and a brother of the Earle of Cathel: such was the successe of the English, and losse of the Scottish.

(17) Luther they lacked and set on fire, tooke the Island Saint Colmes, Branghitrag, Rochesburgh, Humes Castle, and others: so that many Gentlemen in Fundall, and the Meres, came to the Protector and entered into termes and conditions of Peace. In the meane while by the working of the Goostmoor, and Queen Dowager, the young Queene was suddenly conveyed from Strimling, vnto the He, and Abbey of Mitchambrus, as to a place of more security, and shortly after into France to be married vnto the Dauphin, thee then being of age betwixt five and sixe: wherewith the English looformed, as they determined and threatened the Conquest of Scotland. But God who is the disposer of Kingdoomes, and hath the hearts of Princes in his owne hand, in his vnsearchable decrees, saw it not time to vntie as yet, the whole Island vnder one Crowne, to which end he suffered the French to assaile the Scots, and England to be burthened with her owne ciuill broyles.

(18) For the Protector returned, and a Parliament at London assembled, all Colledges, Free-Chappels, and Chanteries, were giuen to the King, wherein was repealed the Statute formerly made, and commonly called the five articles, which had bene the cause of many Martyrs deaths, in the daies of King Henry his Father, as also other enacted by King Richard the second, and Henry the first, for the suppression of Scriptures in English, and other points held, in their daies accounted heretical, at which time also impositions went forth to cleanse the Church of all Images, and Commissioners sent with authority to pull them downe, who first began at the Cathedral Church of Saint Pauls in London, and thence proceeded calling downe thole Idols, in all the Churches throughout England and Wales. Whereof great stirres precluely happened and in Cornwall the first.

(19) For the Kings Commission being put in practise, and thise gay golden Images cast downe, broken and burnt, their Priests accounted the Act sacrilegious, and one of them as Paul for zeale, sought to make his sacrifice with blood, but sparing his owne, heathed his knife in the heart of Master Budy a Commissioner, imploied about the same business: which fact was so fauoured among the rurall Commons of Cornwall, and Devonshire (who euer gave voice for the papall continuance) that in a rebellious manner they combined together against the King.

(20) Their chiefe Captaines were Humphrey Amandell, Gouernour of the Mount, with sixe other Gentlemen of name, neither were the Priests backward in to bad a worke, whereof Robert Ticham, and seauen others were the forwardest men, accompanied with no lesse then ten thousand tall Souldiers, who all sought to vndoe those points of religion, which the King by law and act of Parliament had ordained to be obserued: Whereupon they besieged the City of Excester, and with many sharp assaults fought the possession thereof, twise firing the Gates, and leauing nothing vndone that either wit or warge would afford to obtaine: for they brought the Citizens to such distresse that they forced them to mould vpon brasse for their bread, working it in Cloathes, for otherwise could they not bring it to incorporate together: their dauntless flesh was their owne horse, and those slaine were distributed afield to the poore as rich for which their loyalty and most faithfull seruice King Edward did both highly esteeme them, and richly reward them by confirmation of the Cities Charters, enlarging the liberties, augmenting the reuenues and giuing vnto the Citizens the manner of Exland, as the signet of his loue for their seruice to the Crowne, to be had in remembrance of their loialty for euer. Meane while the Rebels robbed the Countrey, vnto whom all things was common that came vnto hand.

(21) The Rebels thus pestering thoir parts with their riotous attempts, looked and well hoped that others would haue ioined to their aide, but therein deciaied, they lally fell to Consultation what was to be done, and in fine concluded for the best policy to atticle with the King, which how to be set downe, bred likewise much trouble and disturbance with their confused cries: for these rude and vnerperienced Counsellors made their owne conceited opinions the fundamentall matters for redresse, some would bane this, and other some that, but none would be gainefull of his will or demand, holding his voice as worthy of hearing in the Court of assembly, as his body an aide to support the Addition, so that long it was ere they could light on their owne discontents, and longer ere they could agree what they would haue reformed, onely still constant in variable vacillancy, for some would haue no Iustices, others no Gentlemen, Parkes must be Pastures, and Inclosures must downe, the Priests euer pulling the Bell rope to ring the Masse into England, and to towll Cardinal Pole from Rome, and with much much adoe, lastly to little purpose these Articles were agreed vpon, and sent to the King, the Copy whereof was thus.

(22) Forasmuch as man, except he be borne of Water and the holy Ghost, cannot enter into the kingdom of God, and forasmuch as the gates of Heaven be not open without this blessed Sacrament of Baptisme, therefore we will that our Curates shall minister this Sacrament at all times of need as usual in the weeke daies, as on the holy daies.

Item, we will have our children confirmed of the Bishops in due season, we shall within the same refer to them.

Item forasmuch as we constantly beleue that after the Priests hath spoken the words of Consecration being at Masse, there celebrating and consecrating the same, there is very really the Body and blood of our Saviour Iesus Christ God and Man, and that no substance of Bread and Wine remaineth after, but the very same Body that was borne of the Virgine Mary, and was given up on the Crosse for our Redemption: therefore we will have Masse celebrated as it hath bene in times past, without any man communicating with the Priests, forasmuch as many rudely presuming vermouthly to recuse the same put no difference betwene the Lords body and other kind of meate, some saying that it is bread before and after: some saying that it is profitable to no man except hee receive it, with many other absurd termes.

Item we will have in our Churches reformation.

Item we will have holy bread, and holy water in the remembrance of Christs precious Body and Blood.

Item we will that our Priests shall sing and say without audible voice, Gods service in the Quere of the Parish Churches, and not Gods service to be set forth like a Christiansse play.

Item for as much as Priests be men dedicated to God, for ministering and celebrating the blessed Sacrament, and preaching of Gods word, we will that they shall live chaste without marriage, as Saint Paul did, being the elect and chosen vessel of God: saying unto all honest Priests, theyre followers of me.

Item we will that the six Articles which our Sovereign Lord King Henry the eight set forth in his later daies, shall be obeyed, and so taken as they were at that time.

Item we praye Gods King Edward, for we be his birth body and goods.

(23) To these their Demands the King sent this answer, there is pitying their ignorance, and blameworthy folly, and therewithall his Generall pardon, to as many as would desist whyles it was time. First he reproved them, for their presumptions, that continuously to rise against their dread Sovereign, to the disturbance of his loyal Subjects peace; whose simplicity they had notoriously abused, in giving his name to draw them into action of Rebellion: and no lesse likewise in the grounds of their demands. As in their first Article for Baptisme, where it was well knowne the same was admitting as necessity required, or rather commanded by the Booke of Common prayer, published by authority of Parliament, and as themselves knew in present practise. But touching the Sacraments in their second Article, how impudently they did belie the true rectitude thereof, was manifest, who make so much difference in that holy administration, that they account no profit in Common bread, besides the nourishment of their naturall Bodies: but this blessed bread to be the food of their soules vnto eternall life. And as you be seduced in this (saith the admonition) so in confirmation also they came your simplicities captive, for the truth teacheth so otherwise than themselves beleue, namely pharisai Childe baptized, and dying before confirmation is neckelike in state of Grace, else themselves causes of their childrens damnation: so the service of God brought from an unknowne tongue, cannot surely offend any reasonable man, which is onely to make him vnderstand that, which before he knew not, and to give his consent to those prayers, whereof he hath most need, and giueh the needest touch to his owne feeling conscience for God requireth the heart onely which with an vnderstanding heart, we must sacrifice vnto him. But most of all (which this good King) we marvel at your demand, for the six Articles restored, to haue them in power as formerly hath bene. Doe you know what you aske, or in obtaining doe you know what you get? They were lawes indeed lately made, but quickly repented; too cruell for you, and too mercifull for vs; who would haue our Raigne written with milke, and not with blood, and because they were bloody, we took them away, with the same authority, by which they were made, least reteining them, our word should be too often drawne, and rigour extended vpon our true and well-deserving subjects. We for our parts keepe no longer to doe, then to be a father vnto our people, and as God hath made vs your rightfull King, so hath he commanded you vnto obedience; by whose great Maistie we seruate, you shall feele the power of the same God in our sword, which how mighty it is, no subject knoweth: how puissant it is no priuie man can iudge, and how mortall no English heart can thinke: therefore embrace our mercy while it is offered, least the blood spilt by your meynes cry vengeance from the Earth, and be heard in the eares of the Lord in Heauen.

(24) All this notwithstanding, the Rebels perished in their traitorous attempts: against whose seditions Sir John Russell Lord Pray Secreter, was appointed Generall of the Kings Army; vnto whose assistance was iouined the Lord Grey of Wilton, vnder whom served a band of Italianes intended against Scotland, these lay at Bristol attending the coming of the Lord Generall: who now was marched Westward to Hinton, where day looking for more supply, thole which he had, began to shrink away, whereby the Rebels were emboldened to make towards him, and came as far as Fenington bridge within three Miles of Hinton, and in a faire Meadow there spread their Colours. The Lord Russell though weak in comparison of them, holding it more honour to assaile then to be assailed, made forward euen vnto the Bridgewater where fight the Enemies prepared themselves to fight, and with a strong guard maintained the Bridge, besides which there was passage ouer the Riuer, that belid his course betwixt the two Armies.

(25) Great were the attempts the Lord Lieutenant gaue, and manfull was the resistance that the Rebels made, yet lastly the way was woune, and followed vnto the battell of the disloyals: where presently became a most cruell fight, and a while was maintained to the losse of their blood, but the sille heares failing, and the true subjects courage increasing, the Cornish immediately gaue backe and fled, wherat the Kings soldiers out of Order fell to the spoile, minding nothing lesse then that which presently ensued, for the Cornishmen perceiving their disordered carriage, suddenly returned, and began a new fight, when the Lord Russell likewise ordered a new his Army: these furiously iouined, a sharpe and cruell encounter ensued, with the losse of much blood, and the slayes of three hundred Rebels, who lastly took to their heeles and left the field: the chace a while followed, and the soldiers scattered, a fearful cry suddenly arose, that all the Commons were vp, which caused the Lord Generall to reume vnto Hinton: whether shortly came the Lord Grey of Wilton, having in pay Spanish an Italian Captaine with three hundred foot.

(26) The Lord Russell forces augmented, his greatest care was to relesce the City Exeter, whither vpon the third of August he halted from Hinton being a thousand strong, and passing ouer the Downes toward Haverly, lodged his Campe that night neere to the Wind-Mill, whereof the Rebels having intelligence, raised themselves from Saint Mary

Mary Clift, and made amaine vnto the Downes, thinking to forspite the Lord Generall before hee was ready; but here as vigilant as they were forward, encountered them againe in battell, and againe gaue them the ouerthrow with the losse of the most of their liues, the rest escaping by flight, got vnto the Towne of Saint Mary Clift.

(17) The newes thereof bruited, and the Papal side bruited by these three ouerthrowes, the Commons in whole troupes resorted to their aide, and to make all sure on their side (by the presence and helpe of their consecrated God) they brought into the field the Crucifixe vnder a Canopy; which in stead of an Altar was set in a cart, accompanied with Crosses, and Candlesticks, Banners, Holy Bread, and holy-water, both to drise away Diuels, and to dull their enemies swords; which notwithstanding they did not, neither could they deliuer themselves in the day of destruction; for the Towne being fired, and the Armes met vpon Clift heath, a most cruell and bloody battell was fought, wherein was slaine the whole rout of the Rebels, & all these crinkets cast in the dirt.

(18) The chiefe Captaines were taken and sent vnto London, who were Humphrey Arundell, Wisland, Holmer and Barre, who there paid the law with the losse of their liues. Many others were executed without iudgement, onely by Marshall Law, as was Brier Maior of Bodmin in Cornwall, vnto whom Sir Anthony King flew, Prouost Marshall sent worde he would visite him at dinner, but before he was set downe, commanded the Maior to cause a paire of Gallowes to be set vp; & the Table taken away, he willed the said Maior to accompany him to the place, & there presently commanded Brier his Host to the halter, and saw him hanged before he departed.

(19) At the same time, and neere the same place dwelled a Miller, who had beene a busie doer in the Rebellion, but hee knowing the danger, willed his man to take the name of the master, if any enquired after him; whereupon the said Sir Anthony came to the mill, and calling for the master, the man in his name presented himselfe, who sutable commanded him vnto the Gallowes, the seruant then seeing the danger of death, confessed hee was not the master, but the man: well, said the Knight, thou canst neuer doe thy master better seruice then to hang for him, and thereupon trusted him vppon in the next tree.

(10) As these things were in acting in the West, so other Commotions arose in other partes of the Land, though brinched vnder another pretence, namely the laying open of inclosures, which the king by Proclamation had commanded to be done, but many offenders bearing themselves out with greatness, slackened the execution, and the poorer presuming vpon the Kings pleasure, began to execute his commission themselves, and those in many places at once, as in Kent, Essex, Summerfet, Buckingham, Northampton and Lincolne shires they did.

(11) But most dangerous was that in Norfolk, whose Inhabitants following the examples of the rest, held out much longer, and in more violent manner. Their first attempt was at Attleborough against one Gower that had taken away part of their commons, next at Wimborne, where by the instigation of John Flowerden they cast downe the fences of Inclosures, belonging to Robert Ket a Tanner in the same Towne; who to bee eare with Flowerden brought them to Hecherfet, and set them on worke to pull downe both hedge and ditch of his pasture grounds inclosed: to which worke hee gaue such desperate encouragements, that these vnrules presently chose him for their ringleader, who with them passed to Brentnott, laying all leuel where they came.

(12) Their number encreasing, and doings outrageous, Sir Edward Windham Knight, at that time high Sherriffe of the Shire, made proclamation among them in the Kings name to depart, which if they did not forthwith, he pronounced them Traitors, but had not his Horse bene the swifter, he had bene either taken or slain, thereupon their terror began to be fearefull, & themselves to be furnished with weapons, Armour, and Artilery, daily brought them in abundance by the By-dwellers, besides store of victuals to maintaine their Campe.

(13) But now considering what dangers were open, if disperdely scattered they should attend their bad worke, they held it best policy to draw to one place: and to fortifie themselves together with further strength; whereupon with full resolution, Manfield was thought fittest neere vnto Mount Surrey, a place built by these Eagles of that County, and vpon *S. Leonard*s-hill which hangeth ouer Norwich, they vnkenelled themselves; besides these of Manfield, a lesser rabble of them lay at King-chefe neere Linne, which were towled thence by the Gentlemen of those parts: who first from Wotton, then from Thetford, and next from Brauden, were forced to their liues at Manfield.

(14) Their parts were rigorous, or rather inhumane euen to their wellwillers, for it is knowne truth, that Sir Roger Woodhouse in kinde courtisie bringing them two Carts laden with Beere, and another with victuals, was recompensed with the losse of all his Hories, his owne apparell, and his body tugged, and torne, cast into a ditch, whom lastly with others was imprisoned by them in the house of Mount Surrey, and yet would they become verie Religious, hating one Comer for their Chapla, who deuotly did seruice vnto them both morning and evening.

(15) To these, the Jewelly disposed of Suffolke assembled, as also the scum and dregs out of Norwich, adding still fewell to their own smoky flames by firing of Beacons, ringing of Bells, and what not, to set all in an uproare: some true and faithfull subiects they violently led away, and made them of their counsell, namely Thomas Cud, Maior of Norwich, Robert Watfon Peracher, and Thomas Alderich Gentlemā, Sergeant & Cullyn, Sergeant Gandy, whom they kept fettered, and compelled them to be strident vpon Kete; who now took vpon him to bee the Kings Deputy, and to give out warrants in his Maiesties name, by vertue of which many of Worship and credit were fetched from their wellings, brought before him, and violently cast inso prison: their Rabble encreased to the number of fixetie thousand men.

(16) And that the shew of iustice and piety was only the mark whereto these lawlesse knelled, they ordained a tribunall seat in an olde tree, whose Canopie was the Cope of Heaven: In this last the Tanner as Chancellor or chiefe Iudge, accompanied with his Counsellors, assisted by two choicest men out of euery hundred among them, hisher assembled the complaints of the Campe, and hence had they commission to fetch out of Ships both Ordnance, powder and shotte, and out of Gentlemens houses all abilements of warre: and hence such Raskals as had exceeded their commission had iudgement of imprisonment, so that this tree was termed, the Oake of Reformation, whence likewise sometimes Sermons were deliuered to the people, and once by the Reuerent Doctor Parker, which had almost cost him his life.

(17) To this the Kings general Pardon was publicly pronounced by an Herald at Arms, but so farre off from embracing, as the Rebels from the height of the hill, shot at the Cite, which doing little harme, they removed their Ordnance to the lower ground, and thence beganne to batter the walles, and without great resistance entered the town, where they became Masters of all the munitions, and imprisoned the Maior, and many other Citizens.

fought to quier, and to that end sent the L. William Parr, Marques of Northampton, with fifteen hundred horsetmen vnto Norwich, accompanied with the Lords Sheffield, and Wenworth, besides many Knights; who at his first coming thither, summoned the City to yeeld, the Magistrates whereof as willingly obeyed, and repairing to his Standard, yielded vp their Cities sword vnto him; declaring themselves true Subjects to the King, though some of the better sort had fauoured Kets doing, and with them immediately the Lord Marquess entered the City, which the same night was assaulted by the Rebels, whom hee manfully resisted, and slew three hundred of their rouseous rout.

(19) The next day following these blood-hounds vnkennelled by trouper, and entering the City by the Hospital, beganne a most cruell fight, wherein the Lord Sheffield by the fall of his horse into a ditch was butchered slaine by a Butcher, as he sought to recover himselfe, and the rebels now belted with this their fortunate chance, followed the chafe with such slaughter and cry, that they forced the Lord Marquess to forsake the City, and thence tooke Sir Thomas Currenall prisoner, whom they straitly kept in durance till their last overthrow. Norwich they ransacked and set on fire, whole almes as yet fill vpp the ruins, and more had been made, had not God quenched these flames by showers from Heaven.

(40) The Lord Marquess returned, and the Rebels holding Norwich, it was more then time to looke to the maine chance, and therefore those forces that were gathered to invade others, were now thought the fittest to secure our selves, ouer whom was appointed the Lord John Dauley, the warlike Earle of Warwick; hee committing to Cambridge prepared for the enemy, whither reformed the forsaide Lord Marquess, the Lords Willoughby, Percy, and Grey, his lonnes Ambrose and Robert, with many of the Norfolk men, and the twenty three of Dauley shewed himselfe vpon the plaine before Norwich, whence to save the effusion of blood, hee lent Norrey and a Trumpet to summon the City, and to offer a generall pardon; which being againe refused, hee caused his Ordinance to be planted against S. Steuens gate, and his Pioners to breake open the braken gate, whereto many made entry, and diuers were slaine.

(41) S. Steuens gate forced open by Canon shot, the Earle of Warwick entered the City, and with small resistance came into the Market place, where three score Rebels were incontinently executed by Marshall law. But the Earles carriages passing through the City, were surprised and taken by the enemy, wherein was great store of powder and shot, which with triumph they conuied to their Campe, and tooke it a signe of further successe, their want confiding most in those provisions, wherupon they manned the streets of that City, and slew very many of the Kings friends; but the showers of arrows and shot from the kunges Subjects so rained amongst them, that they were forced backe to take shelter in Mansfield their hole of refuge.

(42) The Earle of Warwick then masting the City, shuttall the Gates, then only excepted that gaue way toward Mansfield, and those hee planted with his great Artillery. The Rebels perceiving what hee went about, suddainly made downe towards the Gate, and with great courage and confident cries, fell with such violence vpon their attendants, that they gaue backe and fled, leauing their Ordinance to the will of the Rebels. who presently disposed them amongst their owne, so that the Earle stopped likewise thoe passages, and imploied all his endeauour to defend the City, which notwithstanding he could not, the Rebels making incursions ouer the river from their well floored Campe: and letting the streets in many places on fire, whole attempts so continued and prospered to euill, as some despairing of any good, consiethed the Earle to bee gone. But so farre was hee from such flaine of honour, that drawing forth his owne sword, commanded other to doe the like, and with an interchangeable kisse confirmed the resolution of his bold courage, a Custome indeed vied in greatch danger of warre. And thereupon determining another way to worke, sought to stop the passage from all conuoy of victuall; which the Rebels perceiving, set fire on their Cabbins, and with engines displayed, entrenched themselves at the foote of the Hill, in the valley called Doules-dale, partly vpon vaine Prophecies pronounced among them by certain wizards, who gaue forth that Heb, Dic and Mic (meaning the Rufficks) with their Clubs should fill vp the valley of Doules-dale with the bodies of the dead.

(43) The next day being the fcauen and twentieth of August, the Lord Generall prepared for fight, having newly received a supply of foureteen hundred Lances. But before that Mars should trye his strength by sword, hee sent vnto them a Generall pardon for all things that were past, which when they had againe vterly reiected, hee ranged his battels for fight. The Rebels likewise, set themselves in order, where in the fore-kant all the Gentlemen whom they had taken Prisoners, were placed and conpled in Irons for flaring away, so that their dangers were doubled, and themselves exposed to death ailew by their friends as by their enemies.

(44) But before the charge could be giuen, one Miles a most skillfull Gunner amongst them made shot at the Kings Standard, and broke the Beauer thereof in the thigh, and his horse through the shoulder, which so moued the Earle that hee caused a whole volly of Artillery to be discharged against them, when Captaine Drury with his owne band and the Almoner, thrust fore vpon them, and opened their Battell, wherewith most of the Capaine-Gentlemen escaped away, vpon which brant the Earles light horsetmen came so valiantly on, that the Rebels gaue backe and fled: and with the foremost Robert Ket their Captaine, vpon a swift horse galloped away, the Chafe continued three miles and more, with the slaughter of three thousand and five hundred rebels.

(45) Their battell thus broken, and the most part fled, thoe norwich standing that kept about the Ordinance, determined to die like men, and inclosing themselves among the Cais and Carriages, had the advantage of a Trench and certaine stakes shucke against the horsetmen, whereby they stood more resolutely at defence. The Noble Earle pitying their case, and loath to loole so many braue men, sent Norrey King at Armes vnto them, with proffert of pardon if they would lay downe Armes, and returne to obedience, otherwise they well saw, there was no way but death: Their answere was, that they were free borne English men, who disdained all ignominious death, wherunto they said, they were appointed, and barrels of ropes brought into the field (as they were informed) to strangle them, so that if they must needs die, they chose the manly deaths of Souldiers, not trauelling the furred pottomies for surprize, and then to be trussed vp like dogs.

(46) Their answere returned, and compassion still working in the Lord Generals breast, when hee had set his whole Army against them both of horse and foote, and the signe of battell ready to haue beene giuen, hee sent to them once more, to know if they would belicue and embrace their pardon, if hee came in person to declare it to them himselfe; wherunto they answered, that they knew him to be honourable, and would from his mouth most thankfully receive it: thereupon hee repayed vnto them, and causing againe their pardon to be read, confirmed the same with such effectuall words, as they all cast away their weapons and with one voice cried, God save King Edward.

(47) The day following, Ket the Captain of this rebellion, except into a Barne of one M. Risher of Swanton, was by two of his servants apprehended, & with 20. horsemen conveyed to Norwich, where 9. of the chieftest Rebels had judgement of death, and were all of them hanged upon the Oake of Reformation, which not till then, had the true note of that name. Ket with his brother William were brought unto London, and thence backe againe into Norfolk, where William Ket the younger was hanged upon the high Steeple of Wymondham, and Robert Ket the Arch-Rebel in chains upon the Castill of Norwich, whose Citizens annually solemnized the day of their delivery with no lesse joy, then the Jewes did when they had escaped the sword of wicked Hamas.

(48) These hazards set in the South, West, and East, the North likewise among them would come in for a cast, as forward and able to undergoe rebellion, and their zeales as hot as any others, the occasion conceived, was, the Papall Religion abolished by Law, whose tottering toppie they meant to make ready by maine strength of Armes, notwithstanding the very foundations were so shrewdly undermined. The place where this canker beganne was Seimer in the North-riding in Yorkshire spreading it selfe further into the East-riding also, & the first branches of this giddy heady wine, were persons no better then William Ombler a Yeoman, Thomas Dale a Parish Clerke, and one Stevens of the Poole, employed to blanch forth these busineses betwixt them.

(49) Their pretences were faire, as to restore the Church right, and to disburden the land of all grievances imposed, this bring ever founding, that the Pope was the Man, that King Edward was an Inroder, if not a more heretick, that the Church had the power of both the sword, which now vpon a blind prophetic they presupposed should be drawne against the King & his Nobles, whole times (as they beleaved) should be no more, but that the land should be ruled by fower gouernours, when the Commons should meete in a Parliament assembled from the foure Coasts of England, wherof themselves now made the last.

(50) First therefore to raise men, and to bring all into confusion, they fired their Beacots, whence the parkes of fiction were carried amaine; for the ruddell alwayes vauiling to labour, and the first fell to breake into flame, flocked together on heapes, each one hauing a Common-wealth in his head, and all of them disliking the reformation of religion that the King had commanded: Among these, the most feditious had euer a voice which drew consent to forward the Action, and especially to beate downe the rich, wherof they made their first assay vpon write a Gentleman, Sauage a Marchant, Clepton and Berry, whom they cruelly murdered, and disposing of them of their apparel left their naked bodies on the Wald before Seimer, thence passing forward from Towne to Towne, tooke many away that were unwilling to goe, and all to fulfill their perfidious prophetic.

(51) Their number now increased vnto three thousand, the Country beganne to grow in great feare, especially the Gentlemen, and the richer sort, seeing their liues and substance thus thirled for and sought after: but presently downe came the kings pardon with proffers of life, which lo willingly was embraced, that Ombler & Dale were quiet forsaken, & almost left alone, who with Wright, Peascoe, Featherell, and Buttery were worthily executed at Yarke vpon the one and twenty of September following.

(52) As the Commons by these tumultuous rebellions greatly disquieted the peace of the land, so the chieftest Lords did disturb the Court of the young King, where the greatest Counsellors through emulation and disdaine, banded each against others, without respect of themselves, or regard of their Soueraigne; wherof the Kings vncles, the Protector and Admirall are noted for the first, and with the first paid their offences with their liues: they both were the brethren of Queene Jane the Kings mother deceased, the elder Lord Edward Duke of Sommerfet was Protector of his Person, Rittals and Dominions. And Thomas Lord Seamer Baston of Sudley the younger, high Admirall of England, both worthy persons, had they known their own worthe for so long blood they in safety of life and true honor as the bonds of brotherhood and nature stood vniuolated betwixt them, but that once broken, their liues lay open to dishonour and death.

(53) The younger brother Lord Thomas had married Queene Katherine Perre, the last of the many wiues of King Henry the eight, who vndoubtedly bore himselfe no manner by that match, neither the state or name of a Dowager Queene: thought of herselfe a woman complete with singular humility. And the Dutchesse of Sommerfet matched with the greatest Pierre in the Land, held her State equal to her husbands degree: and for place and precedence, as report hath diuulged, the lamentable tragick of these two great Brethren beganne; which now in acting brought vpon the Stage at once their owne destructions, the lands rebellious, and the griefes of the good young King, into a fatal and vnrrecoverable sicknesse, wherof lastly followed his death.

(54) So subtle is the old Serpent, and so ready euer to lowe cares among wheate, that hee disturbed religious proceedings with all the calamities almost at one times first, setting matters of discord betwixt them, by scandalizing tongues, then iuolues of suspitions spiced with enue; and lastly hurried vnto death. In summe that the Protector suffered his brother to be accused and condemned in Parliament of high Treason (whether true or false God onely knoweth) and vnder his owne hand writing, committed his head to the axe: wherby one of the 3 twined cords of England strength was cut slender by that fatal and unhappy stroke, and his owne now made loose in the Cable, proved too weak: by farre to hold fast the Anchor, wherby the shipwrecke of his owne life was shortly made.

(55) The Lord Admirall indifferently was, that hee had purposed to destroy the young King, and to translate the Crowne vnto himselfe, as standeth recorded in Statute made the third of this Kings Reigne, for which the twenty of March he suffered death vpon the Tower-hill which as many supposed that it was the Dutchesse of Sommerfet doing; so the wisest sort feared, it would be the ruine of her husband the Duke, the experiment wherof had often bene approoued, and indeed was too fatally linked as it chanced in these two brethren.

(56) For the Admirall being made away by order of law, the giddy Commons without either order, or law, rose vp in their Insurrections as hath bene said: And the Lords returned from their suppressions beganne forthwith to enuy and article against the Protector, which they published by Proclamation against him, wherein hee was accused, 1. of enill gouernment: 2. the losse of the kings Peers in France: 3. to be ambitious in his buildings, regarding the Counsellors: 4. a fower of ledesion amongst the Nobles: 5. dangerous to the King: a scandalizer of the Council, 8. and lastly, that hee was no lesse then a Traitor. Against whom they desired the aid of the Londoners to take from him the King, to all which leueneene Counsellors subscribe their names.

(57) These Statefits in consanition dayly at London, and the Protector residing still with the King, intercourse of letters were interchangeably both sent and received, wherof two, from euery part one, and euen at one instant were sent vnto the Lord Maior and Citizens of London, requiring their aide in these their opposite quarrels, and surely in their assembly the talk of the Lords by the Recorder was so well toide, as had not a graue Citizen slept vp betimes, the common Councell had granted and againt their King, whole wisdom and loyaltie, in regarde my selfe a Citizen, would haue it recorded to his everlasting memory, and an example and moine for ont obedient loue and duty toward our Soueraignes, I will inferre as I find them vntered and spoken.

(58) In this case (said hee) good it is to thinke on things past, to auoide the danger of things to come, as I remember a story written by Salomon in his Chronicles of the warres betwixt the King and his Barons, who euen then as our Lords doe now, demanded aide of the Maior and Commons of London, againt their Soueraigne King Henry the third, and that in a cause rightfull, and good for the Common-weale, which was the execution of certain wholesome lawes, somewhat derogating from his princely prerogative, which hee would not permit. The aide was granted, and quarrell came vnto battell, wherein the Lords prevailed, and tooke the King and his sonne prisoners. But they againe restored to liberty, among other conditions this was one, that the King should not onely graunt his free pardon to the Lords, but also vnto the Citizens of London, which was done, yea and the same confirmed by Parliament. But what followed? was it forgotten? no surely, nor need our forgotten during the Kings life: for the liberties of the City were taken away, strangers appointed to bee our heads and Gouernours, the Citizens giuen away both body and goods, and from one persecution to another, were most miserably afflicted: such it is to enter the wrath of a Prince, which (as Salomon saith) is death: Wherefore, forasmuch as this aide is required of the Kings Maiessty, whose voice (being our high Shepheard) wee ought to obey, rather then to hearken to the Lords, whom neuertheless I wish not to bee vnterly cast off, my counsell is, that they with vs, and wee with them, become humble Petitioners vnto his Highnesse, that it would please him to heare such complaints againt the Lord Protector, as may be iustly alledged and proued, and I doubt not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither shall the King, nor yet the Lordes haue cause to seeke for further aide, neither we to offend any of them both.

(59) These words well weighed, and the Councell dissolved, five hundred Londoners were prepared in a readinesse for Sir Philip Hoby being sent from the Lords to the King, so deliuered their minds, that the Lord Protector was as commanded out of presence, and the next day being the twelfth of October, the Lords of the Councell resorted to Windesore, where they so wrought with the King, as his vncke was deliuered into their hands, whom the same night they imprisoned in Beauchampes Tower in the same Castel, and the next day strongly attended, brought him to London, whence the streets were guarded onely by householders, the Aldermen taking the charge of the busines, and so to the great griefe and vndering of the people hee was conueyed to the Tower, and there left.

(60) Whither shortly after the Lords themselves repaired, and charged the Protector with these 20. Articles as followeth.

1 That at his entry into that weighty office, hee was expressly prohibited to doe any thing in State without the assent of the last Kings Executors.

2 That hee had contrariwise vpon his owne authority both subuerted lawes, and flaid iustice, as well by letters, as commandement.

3 That hee had deliuered diuers persons arrested, and committed to prison for felonie, manslaughter, murder and treason, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

4 That hee had made Capteins and Lieutenants our weighty affaires vnder his owne Seale and Writing.

5 That hee had alone communicated with forraigne Ambassadors about most weighty State affaires.

6 That hee had checked diuers of the Kings Priuy Councell, speaking for the good of the State, yea and threatened to displace them if they contented not to his mind.

7 That hee had againe law erected a Court of Requests in his owne house, whither were enforced diuers of the Kings Subjects to answer for their Free-holds.

8 That hee had for money disposed Officers in the Kings gift, money, traies, and Wardes, and giuen presentations of Benefices, and Bishopricks, yea and medled with sale of the Kings lands, which by office hee could not, without consent of the maior voice of the Councell.

9 That hee had commanded multiplication by Alcumurie to the abuse of the Kings coine.

10 That againt the King and Councell will, hee had set forth a Proclamation againt inclosures, which had caused dangerous insurrections in the land, wherein diuers of the Kings liege Subjects haue bene spoiled, and many a worthy man therein slaine.

11 That to the same end hee had giuen commission with Articles annexed concerning inclosures of Commons, high wayes, and decayed Cottages, giuing the Commissioners authority to heare and determine the same causes, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

12 That hee had suffered Rebels and traitours to assemble, and lie in Campe and Armour againt the King, his Nobles, & Gentlemen, without any speedy suppressing of them.

13 That by his gifts in money, with promises of Fees, rewards and seruices, hee had encouraged many of the said rebels.

14 That in fauour of them contrary to law hee had caused a Proclamation to bee made, that none of the said Rebels, or Traitors should be sued, or vexed for any of their offences committed in the said Rebellion.

15 That hee had liked well of these rebellions, and had said that the courtousnesse of the Gentry gaue the occasion, affirming that it was better for the Commons to die, then to perish for lacke of liuing.

16 That hee had reported the Lords of the Parliament were loath to reform themselves for the reformation of Inclosures, and therefore the people had good cause to reforme the things themselves.

17 That vpon the report of the defaultes and lackes of Bullings nothing was there amended.

18 That the Forts of Newham and Blacknesse standing in want of men and victuall, whereof hee was informed, were suffered notwithstanding still to want, to the great encouragement of the French, and dishonour of the English.

19 That hee had vntuly published, that the Lords at London intended to deliroy the King, which hee instantly desired hee would neuer forget, and to that end instigated many young Lords, whereby sedition and discord was made among the Nobles.

20 Lastly, that whereas the Lords assembled at London, onely to consult vpon a charitable communication to be had with the Protector for his misgouernment of the King and Realme, hee contrariwise sent letters of credence to many places and persons, that the said Lords were no less then high Traitors to the King, and great disturbers of the whole realme.

All these accusations notwithstanding (the young King so labouring it) he was released from the Tower the sixt of February following vnto his free liberty, though not vnto his former authority, and so remained remained vntouched for the space of two yeeres and two dayes.

(65) Whilest these his and other troubles were commencing in England, the Lord Grey of Wilton left Lieutenant of the North, remained in Scotland, where many feates of warre were vndergone, and many Forts fortified, and some taken, such were Lauden, Haddington, and Yester, at whose assault certaine opprobrious speeches in most contemptuous manner were vttered by a Scotsman against King Edward of England, whereat the Lord Grey was so offended, as vpon composition for the deliuerie of the Castell, all were let goe with life, onely that person excepted, and his name knowne to bee Newton, was appointed to die for the same; but hee denying the words, imposed them vpon one Hamilton, a man valorous inough, and wrongfully touched, who denied the accusation, and challenged Newton to the combat, which hee accepted, and in performance slew Hamilton, though more at disadvantage then for lacke either of courage or strength: The victor was rewarded with a great chaine of gold, and the woman that the Lord Grey was at the present, though many maligned and accused him still to bee the vtterer of those base words.

(66) The English keeping foot still in Scotland, burnt Dunbar and Marstonburgh, and fortified Haddington both with munition and men, spoyling the Country, saith Bishoppe Lesly, all about Edinburgh, Leith and Meres: repairing of Forts, and placing of Garrisons, as if they meant there to remaine and abide: but their young Queene being conuulsed into Fraunce, and the Scots aided with the assistance of the French, to quit themselves, that they voided their land of the English, and recovered of them all they had lost. In which times of variable successe, the King but a child, the Nobles at variances, and the combustious Commons obedient to neither, the French sought to reconer the holds that the English had in their Country, and first by stealth meant to surpris the fortress of Ballinbeg, vnto which enterpris Frenchmen and were choise, vnder the conduct of Antoine Chastillon.

(67) These secretly marching in the night with ladders and furniture meete for the enterprize, approached within a quarter of a mile vnto Ballingberg fort, amongst whom was an English Souldier discharged out of their pay, for that he had taken a French woman to wife. This Carter for so was his name got entertainment vnder Chastillon, and now vnderstanding whereabout they went, hastily made from his Company, and gave the Alarme to his Countrymen within the Fort; where Sir Nicholas Arnauld Captaine of the peece, caused him to bee drawne vp betwix two pikes to the height of the wall, vnto whom hee declared the attempt in hand, & among them stood so valiantly in defence of the fort, that hee gaue many a wound, and received some himselfe by him; and this meane the Peece was quit from surprisall, and the slaughter of the French so great that fiftene Wagons were laden away with dead Corps.

(68) This losse sustained, and the English maisters in those parts of their Mainie, the French sought to trie fortune for their Isles in the Seas, namely Garnsey and Tiersey, possidet and subiect to King Edwards Crowne, their preparations were great, and their Marshallists many; which notwithstanding with such losse were beaten backe from their banks, as a thousand men at Armes were slaine in the attempt, & the Incepsse so unfortunate, as the French for feare of further discouragement forbode the report, and made an inhibition, nor to mention the expedition of that Iourney.

(69) Neuerthelesse the French King ceased not his desired purposes, till hee had got by surrender Hambletonne, Blacknesse, Ballingberg, and the town of Ballingne in selfe, though bought at a deere rate, and deliuered with great griefe to the English; vnto such a lamentable state, and dishonourable composition was the good King Edward brought, by the bandings of his great Counsellors, and insurrections of his vnuly Commons; after which calamities a great and mortall disease followed, namely the sweating sicknesse, that raged extremely through the land, wherein died the two Sonnes of Charles Brandon, both ofttime Dukes of Suffolke, besides an infinite number of men in their best strengths, which followed onely Englishmen in forraigne Country: no other people infected therewith, whereby they were both feared and shunned in all places where they came.

(66) And to fill vp the dolours of these dolefull times, the good Duke of Summersey was againe apprehended, euen when the least suspicion was of any vnderre workings: for vpon his first releasement, to linke a firme love betwixt him and the potent Earle of Warwicke, his most malignant; a marriage was contracted betwixt the Lord Zyfe his eldest sonne & heire, and the Lady the Earles eldest daughter, which was solemnized with great ioy at Sheene, in presence of the young King; this amity was outwardly carried with all faire shewes for a time, though inwardly barred lay secretly hid, as by the sequell incontinencie appeared: for after a solemn creation of many Elaxes, wherein the Earle of Warwicke had his life raised to bee Duke of Northumberland, vnto whose rayes at that time most of the Courtiers cast their eyes: the sparkes of emulation began presently to breake forth; where the simplicitie of the one gaue advantage to the other, to compasse that which long had bene sought.

(67) The Duke of Summersey not well aduised, and yielding too much vnto Sympathie flatteries, was put in feare of some sodaine attempt intended against him, and therefore counsellid to wear vnder his garment a coate of defence, which hee accordingly did, and being so armed came vnto the Councell Table, supposing no man had known of any such thing; but his boosome being opened and the Armour perused, hee was forthwith apprehended, as intending the death of some Councillor, and by Northumberland so vehemently taxed (who in Councell was euer the principall man) that hee was forthwith attached, and sent to the Tower, vpon the sixteenth of October with the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Michael Stanlop, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir Ralph Fane, and Sir Miles Partridge and the next day the Dutcheffe his wife was likewise committed; all of them for suspicion of treason and felonie; and hee standing so indited vpon the *second of December following, was arraigned at Westminster, attended with the Axe of the Tower, Balles, Halberds, and Pollaxes a great number.

(68) His inditement was for treason and felony, and the same vrged vnto extremity, with many amplifications, and bitter imectines, especially that hee had sought and pretended the deaths of the Duke of Northumberland, the Lord Marquess, and Pembroke: where after many mild answers to these matters objected, he put himselfe to be tried by his Peeres, who acquitted him of treason, but found the inditement of felonie: when presently the Axe was commanded away, whereas the shote of the people shewed the great affection that was borne to the Duke: little mistrusting that the sentence of death was pronounced against him, or that the kings vnde should die as a felon; neither did the Statute intend any such thing as some are of opinion, but rather was purposely made for the inpression of rebellions, and vnlawfull assemblies, wherein such as should seeke or procure the death of any Councillor should be guilty as in case of felonie. But such was the pleasure of the all ordering power, that he which knew no theft should die for that sinne; so that neither himselfe, nor his wisest Counsellors demanded the benefite of his Clergy which would haue saved his life if it had bene required.

The Duke of Summersey arraigned.

* Of Winchester William Herbert.

The Duke condemned of felony.

(69) His sentence thus pronounced, hee was againe sent backe to the Tower, wherein he kept a very ill Christmas, yea and that in the Court, inclined to little mirth, the King lamenting the condemnation of his vnclie, had not more witty disportes broke off his passions, which how, and by whom they proceeded, let others report, and vs continue the Tragedie of this Duke; who vpon the two & twenty of February following being Friday was brought to the Scaffold vpon Tower-hill by eight in the morning, where turning himselfe towards the East, he spake to the people, as followeth.

(70) Dearely beloued friends, I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit I neuer offended against the King, neither in word nor deed, and have alwayes been as faithfull and true vnto this Realme, as any man hath been: but forasmuch as I am by law condemned to die, I doe acknowledge my selfe as well as others to be subiect thereto: wherefore to testify mine obedience which I owe to the lawes, I am come hither to suffer death, whereunto I willingly offer my selfe with most hearty thanks vnto God, that hath giuen me this time of repentance, who might through sodaine death haue taken away my life, that I neither should haue acknowledged him nor my selfe.

(71) These words uttered, besides others exhortatory, that the people would continue constant in the Gospell, suddenly was heard a great noyse, where the assembly was stricken into great feare, some thinking that a storme or tempest descended from above, some supposed that the barrels of Gunpowder in the Armoirie had taken fire, & were all blowne vp into the Aire, others thought that they heard a noyse of horses prepared to battell, some againe affirmed confidently that it did thunder, and others thought verily it was an earth-quake, and thus the ground moued: vnto such confusion and terror were they presently brought, which (saith Steu) was none other, but that certaine men from the Hamlets warned with weapon to guard the Tower-hill, came thither somewhat after the hower appointed, whose forsooth being the Prisoner on the Scaffold, beganne to raine forward themselves, and call to their fellows to come away: which word away sounding as an Echo in the peoples eares, they thought that rescue had come to the Duke to take him away: and seeing the Bil-men to make forward so fast, beganne themselves to shrinke backe from the hill, every man seeking to sue one, and by this accident and confusion, this feare among them fell and beganne: This strice feare ended, another ensued by the running of the people towards the Scaffold, who seeing Sir Anthony Browne riding thitherward, supposed a pardon had come from the King, so that a sodaine shout arose, a pardon, a pardon, God save the King: by which it onely appeared in what sort hee was had, and how much his life was desired of the Commons.

(72) The Duke whose mind being altogether prepared for death, was little moued either to hope or feare, and thereupon addressed his second speech to the people, and with no delected countenance spake againe and said: Beloued friends there is no such matter intended as you vainly hope and believe: 11 yeereth thus good to the Almightie, vnto whose ordinance it is meet that we all bee obedient, wherefore I pray you bee quiet and without tumult, for I am quiet, and let vs so praye in prayer vnto the Lord for the preservation of our Noble King, vnto whose Majesty I with continuall health, with all felicities and abundance of prosperous success, & increase, I wish to his Counsailes the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule all things uprightly with Justice, vnto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to shew your felies obedience, the which is also very necessary for you vnder paine of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preservation of the Kings Majesty. And thereupon asking every man forgiveness, freely forgave every man against him, and desiring the people to bee quiet, lest the flesh should be troubled, though his spirit was willing, hee meekely laide downe his head to the Axe, and receiued at one stroke his rest by death.

(73) Howsoever this Dukes cause was ballanced by law, and him taken away that stood betweene himselfe and their Sonnes, yet was his death heauily digested by the people, that spake very bitterly against the Duke of Northumberland, but most especially the young King sore mourned, and soone mislead the life of his Protector thus unexpectedly taken away, who now deprived of both his vnclies, howsoever the times were passed with pastimes, playes and shewes, to drive away dumpe, yet euer the remembrances of them late to necre vnto his heart, that still he fell sick of a Cough, which grievously increasing ended with a consumption of the lungs.

(74) His sickness continuing with great doubt of his life, vpon purpose saith Crafton to alter the succession of the Crowne, three marriages were in one day solemnized, whereof the first was betwixt the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth sonne to the Duke of Northumberland, and the Lady Eve, eldest daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolke: the second was betwixt the Lord Herbert, sonne and heire to William Earle of Pembroke, and the Lady Katherine the younger daughter of the laid Duke of Suffolke, and the third was betwixt Henry L. Hastings, sonne and heire of Frances Earle of Huntingdon, and Katherine the youngest daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which tending (saith he) to the dispersion of the rightfull heires, they proued nothing prosperous, for two of them were presently made forsaite, the one by death, and the other by divorce.

(75) The policy established, and languishing sickness of the King gaue way vnto such, as sought the euersion of the State, & alienation of the Crowne: In whose eye no head was scene fitter for that fauile Diadem, then was Guilford a Bride, Iane the eldest daughter of Suffolke, whose mother Lady Francis then living, was the daughter of Mary the French Queen, the younger sister to King Henry the eighth, vnto whom King Edward once wrought in his weakness, ordained his Crowne by Will, at the suggestion of such Politiques, as meant to disinherit the two lawfull Princes, Mary and Elizabeth, and to impugne the Statute, in case provided for the succession of K. Henry the eight his children: vnto which Will (O grieue to heare) subscribed all the Kings Council, most of the Nobility, the reuerend Bishops, and all the Iudges of the land, one onely excepted, even Sir James Haller knight, a Iulike of the common Place, vpright in iudgement, & a fauourer of the Gospell, he, I say, neuer would write or consent to the disheriting of the Lady Mary.

(76) The King thus accomplishing what his Statists had wrought, lay languishing in his faingnes: the end wherefore could not be expected but onely by death, and now being worne almost to nothing (his last breath drawing to the limits of Nature) he lift vp his eyes with a prepared heart, and prayed as followeth.

Lord God deliuer me out of this miserable and wretched life, and take me among thy Chosen: herewith not my will but thy will be done, Lord I commend my spirit to thee: O Lord thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy choyse sake, if it bee thy will send me life and health that I may truly serue thee: O my Lord blesse thy people and save them from euill: O Lord God save thy choise people of England: O my Lord God defend this Realme from Papists, and maintain thy true religion, that I and my people may praise thy holy name for thy sonne Iesus Christs sake.

So turning his face and seeing some by him saide, I thought you had not bene's might: yea, said Doctor Owen, we heard you speake to your selfe, then said the King, I was praying to God: O I am faine, Lord haue mercy vpon me, and receive my spirit: and so he sayng, gaue vp the Ghost, to the great losse of England, in whom they had conceiued much hope.

(77) His vertues were rare and many exceeding moit scale to Christs Gospel.K. Edwards letter to Lady Mary.

most Princes, and vices so few, that none can be taxed with leſſe very learned (according to his yeres) he was in the Latine and Greek tongues, the French, Spaniſh, and Italian, yea (and ſaith Hieronymus Car-danus) he was adorned with the ſkill of Logicks, naturall Philoſophie, and Aſtronomie, and for Aſtronomie (ſaith he) my ſelfe had experience, whom he learnedly appoyed of the cauſe and cauſes of Comets: for Humanity, he is the very image of Morality, and in princely grace Maieſty beſt beſeeming a King: briefly, hee may well ſeeme to be a miracle in Nature: nor doe I ſpeake thus Rhetorically to amphiſe things, or to make them more then truth is, for the truth is more then I do offer: and in this hee was moſt admirable, that hee could tell and require all the Ports, Hauens, and Creekes, not within his owne Realme onely, but alſo in Scotland, and like wiſe in France, what coming in there was, how the tide ſerued in euery of them, what burden of Shippe, and what winde beſt ſerued the coming in into them.

(78) Of all his Nobles, Gentry, Juſtices, and Magiſtrates, he tooke ſpeciall name of their Hoſpitality, and religious conuerſations, and that which is beſt accepted of a Prince, hee was very liberall, louing, mercifull, meeke and gentle-towards his people, and ſo farre from blood, as hee euer fauoured and ſpared as much as might bee the life of man, yea euen of Rebels, as wee haue ſene; neither was hee willing to put Hereticks to death, as in a certaine diſſertation had once with M.
Coker appeared: inſomuch that when Iſaac Pateler ſhould be burned for her hereſie, all the Councill could not moue him to ſet his hand to the warrant of her execution, vntill D. Crammer his Godfather, Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury laboured to induce him, vnto whom hee ſaid, what my Lord? will you haue me to ſend her quick to hell, and taking the pen vnto this ſpeech: I will lay all the charge hereof vpon Crammer before God. Then how his hand had bene gotten for his vnles death isto bee admitted.

(79) But his conſtancy vnto Christs Goſpell, with the abandoning of all ſuperſtition, was very admirable, one example among many wee will not leaſe to declare. Lady Mary his ſiſter through the ſuit of Charles the Emperour, made great meanes to haue Maſſe ſaid in her houſe, and that to bee done withooutall prejudice of law: the grauemelle of her Perſon being the immediate ſucceſſor, and the might of the Emperour in amitie with England, moued the Councell to giue their conſent to the ſuit; to forward which Crammer Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury accompanied with Ridley Biſhoppe of London were employd from them to the King, who hearing their meſſage, gaue the replication fo grounded vpon Scripture, as they gaue ouer to vige more that way: but like Politicians alledged the danger in breach of amity with the Emperour, to which the King anſwered, hee would rather aduocate the hazard of his own life then to grant that which was not agreeable to the truth. The Biſhops yettverged him with the bonds of nature, and ſubmiſſiue ſaid, they would haue no nay: the King ſeing himſelfe ſo importunated, burſt into weeping, and ſobbingly deſired them to be content, wherewith the teares ſo abundantly haſt from their eyes, as they departed his preſence not able to ſpeake. And ſora further ce-lasmus of this yong Kings zeale, reade if you pleaſe a letter ſent vnto his ſiſter the Princeſſe Lady Mary, out of the originall.

(80) Right deare, and right entirely beloued ſiſter we greet you well, and let you knowe that it grieueth vs much to perceiue no amendment in you of that, which wee ſer good cauſe, your ſoules health, our conſcience, and common tranquility of our Realme haue ſo long deſired; aſſu-ring you, that our ſufferance hath more demonstration of nature all leaſe then contentation of our conſcience, and fore-ſight of our ſafety. Wherefore, although you giue or occa-ſion of ſuch ſmell as in you is, to diminiſh our naturall leue; yett wee loath to ſeele it decay, and meane not to bee ſo careleſſe of you as wee bee prouoked. And therefore meaning your weale, and therewith ſignifying a care not to be found guilty, in our own conſcience to God, hauing cauſe to require ſeruenſſe that wee haue ſo long for reſpect of loue regarded you omitted our bounden duty, we do ſend at this preſent our right truſty, our right welbeloued Counſel-lor the L. Rich. our Chancelor of England, our truſty and right welbeloued Counſeller Sir Anthony Wingfield Knight, Comptroller of our Houſhold, and Sir Will. Peter Knight, one of our two principall Secretaries in meſſage to you touching the order of your houſe, willing you to giue the ſame credit in theſe things, they ſhall ſay to you from vs, to do therein our name. I ſeuen under our Signet at the Caſtle of Windſor the of in the fiſt yeare of our Reigne, 1556.

(81) The fruites of which Religion this godly King ſhewed by his workes of compaſſion towards the poore, & that eſpecially vpon the foundation of Christs Hoſpitall, the late ſuppreſſed place of the Grey Friars in London, and that vpon occaſion as fol-loweth. It chanced the reuerend Biſhoppe Doctor Ridley to preach before his Maieſty at Weſtmiſter, wher-in hee Chriſtianlike exhorted the rich to be merciful vnto the poore, and to that end amplified the words of the Text againſt the mercileſſe rich, and the negligence of ſuch as were in great place. The Sermon ended, and the King ſet to dinner, hee ſent to the Biſhoppe, commanding him not to depart the Court, before hee knew his further pleaſure, and thereupon cauſing two Chaires to be ſet in the Gallery, all others auoided, hee compelled the Biſhoppe to ſit downe by his ſide, and in no wiſe would admitte him to bee vacuoued.

(82) Where entering conference, hee firſt gaue him hearie thanks for his Sermon, repeating vnto him the chiefe points thereof, and coming to his exhortation for the poore, hee then told him that hee thought himſelfe firſt touched in the ſpeech; for ſaide he, my Lord you ſpeake to them in authority, wherof vnder God I am the chiefe, and muſt firſt make anſwere to him if I be negligent, and therefore I thinke you principally meant me: Gods commandement I knowe muſt eſpecially touch me or to haue compaſſion of the poore members, for whom we muſt make account; and truly my Lord I am muſt willing to travel that way, not doubting but that your long approved learning and wiſdomme, whoſe zeale is ſuch as wiſeth themſelves, but that alſo you had conference with others what ſhould herein to be done, which I am alſo deſirous to know, and therefore I pray for your mind.

(83) The moſt vnto theſe pious conſiderations little looking for ſuch queſtions of the Prince, late a while ſilent, ouerjoyed at his words, and laſtly va-prepared of any preſent inſtructions, told the King that the Citizens of London were beſt able to direct the plot, whoſe great Charity, and well ordered gouernement, beſides their dayly charges, being overburdened with poore, had ſufficient experience, and if it would pleaſe his Maieſtie to direct his letters vnto them himſelfe, hee would be very ready to forther this godly reſolution ſo far as his meanes might any wiſe extend: wherupon the King preſently commanded his letters to be writ, and would not ſuffer the Biſhoppe to depart before himſelfe had thereto ſet his hand and ſignet, deſiring him to deli-uer the ſame to the Lord Maior, and with him to conferre about this buſineſſe, which hee wiſhed might be accompliſhed with all expedition.

(84) The Biſhoppe as ready as the King was deſirous, poſted apace to the Lord Maior of London, where deliuering the letter, offered his aſſiſtance to forward the worke, and they together with ſome Aldermen, and twenty foure Commoners agreede vpon three degrees of the poore, and them diuided again into nine.

(85) The Booke thus drawne, and preſented to the King, hee thereupon deſired to be accounted the chiefe Founder of their reliefe, and forthwith gaue vnto the City S. Bartholomewes Hoſpitall by Smithfield, and the Grey-Friars Church neere adioyning, with

(86) The Kings charitable gifts confirmed by Charter, and a Petition exhibited for liberty to take an Mortmain of lands to a yeerly value without further licence, a place being left in the Patene to containe the summe, King Edward presently called for penne and inke, and with his owne hand filled vpp the space with these words, four thousand Markes by yeere: which done, hee both forth and said: Lord God I prayd thee most beuie thanks, that thou hast given me life thus long to finish this worke to the glory of thy name.

(87) Now as this godly King was carefull in redeeming the time, so likewise to take as it were an account of himselfe, hee kept a iournall booke or Record written with his owne hand, how all things proceeded with him, and with the State, from the first day of his raigne vnto his death: whole many vertues as they were inferior to none of his worthy Progenitors, and scale little short to the best Kings of Iudah, so was hee soone mist of all his loyall Subjects, when the boosome of Gods Saints were opened to the persecutors in words.

(89) He died at Greenwich vpon Thursday the sixe day of Iuly, the yeare of Christ Iesus, one thousand five hundred fifty three, and the seuerceenth of his age, when hee had reigned sixe yeeres five months, and nine daies, and was buried vpon the ninth of August following, in the Chappell of S. Peters Church at Westminster, next vnto his Grandfather King Henrie the seventh.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Confultation for the disposing of the Crowne.

KING EDWARDS life ended by his lingering disease, and the Senatme intending to establish his will; for the space of two daies his death was kept secret, and much confulta-tion among the Nobility had of the businesse, all of them affecting the election of Iane, lest Mary should vndoe what Edward had done, to support which purpose, many projects were cast, and many opinions given how to proceed, yet all ioinlie light in this point, that London was the hand which must reach Iane the Crowne: whose Citizens assistance if they might bee got, the greatest difficulty (as they held it) was halfe vndergoe. And therefore to mould them for Iane, and to London the best try in time of trouble.

marre them for Mary, the Conncell sent for the L.
Maior of London, sixe Aldermen, and twelue Commoners Marchants.

(1) These coming to the Court, were secretlye certified of King Edward his death, where his Will declared, and Letters Patents thewed for the disin-heriting of his two sisters, and the raising of Sussex daughter vnto the Crowne; whose religion was so zealous, and vertues so many (as in truth no Prin-cesse was possibled with more) were so well set forth by theire graue Counsellors, that the Lord Maior and Citizens tooke their oathes for Lady Iane, vnto whose obedience they promised to secure the City.

(3) Lady Mary at Hausden hearing these newes, presentlie remoued to her Mannor of Keningall in Wessex: from whence she wrote her letters vnto the Lords of the Council, wherein shee mannest that her brothers death should so long be kept from her:

Eeeeeee2

The Lord Maior and Citizens sworne to Lady Iane.

Lady Mary writ-eth to the Lords

her: that she being the Princesse next in blood, ordained by act of Parliament, and King Henric Testament to succede, her right enroled in the Records, by the authority of her Father and brother, their owne knowledge and pteicipation to her most rightfull Titles, yet now in consulation to vindice these pretensions both against God and natural allegiance; shee could not but marvell, and rather would continue for some politike consideration, and take them in the best part, then to possesse the least thought of any disloyalty in them; and therefore willed them vpon the recite of her letters to proclaim her Queene, and gouernour of the Realme, in the Cite of London, and in other public places, as in such case appertaineth, with all due obseruances, as they tendered her displeasure and their owne felicitie: this letter was signed at the Mannor of Kensington vnder her Signet the ninth of Iuly 1553.

(4) Vnto which letters the Lords forthwith made answer, first signifying that by good warrant of ancient Lawes of the Land, besides the will of their last King, confirmed vnder his hand and broad Seale, in the presence of the most part of the Nobles, Counsellors, Iudges and other grane personages, assisting and subscribing to the same, that Lady Isabel daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolke should bee inueiled and succeed him in the Imperiall Crowne: vnto whom therefore, and vnto none other, they must giue their loyall subiection, where also they put her in minde of the vnlawfull marriage and disorde of her mother, her owne illegitimation, vncapable of Crowne, or rule of Dominions, wiling her further to desist from any such claime, and to submit her selfe vnto Queene Jane now her Soeueraigne, so would they hold amity with her, els should shee procure greuous vnto them and her selfe, which letters were sent from the Tower of London the ninth of Iuly 1553, and subscribed by the hands of such as follow.

Thomas Canterbury Archbishop.
Thomas Eli, Chancelour.
William Winchester, Marquisse.
John Bedford, Earle.
Henric Suffolke Duke.
Francis Browne, Earle.
John Northumberland, Duke.
William Pembroke, Earle.
Thomas Darce Lord Chamberlaine.
Cobham. William Peter.
Rick. William Casil.
Huntington. John Clarke.
Darce. John Mafon.
Cheryar. Edmond North.
John Gates. Robert Brown.

(5) These Letters received, and the Lords mindes therein made knowne, shee forth with remondest to Framingham Castle, standing more safe from inuasion or easie access, vnto whom the Suffolke men were the first that resorted, offering their seruice vnto her rightfull cause, with condition they might ill embrace the Gospell in the same manner as King Edward had established it, to which the disconsented, though afterwards wearing the Diademe, and petitioned vnto for promise, shee both punished the Writer and answered their expectations, that they should see day well knowe, they being but men, her should not durre her their Head.

(6) The Lords at London to fit their enterprise vpon foot, by proclamation made knowne in most parts of the Ciry, the death of King Edward, and that by Will, hee had bequeathed his Crowne and Dominions, to the vertuous great Princesse, Lady Jane, daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolke (as wee haue said) and so was shee proclaimed by the name of Queene Jane, though many of the Commons willed it had beene Queene Mary; and for some words spoken to that purpose, one Gilbert Pet a servant Vintner, vpon the Pillory lost both his eares. Vnto the aide of Lady Marie came the Earles of Suffolke, Bath and Oxford the Lord Westmorland, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Sir Henric Loringham, Sir William Wolsey, with diuers others of Norfolke and Suffolke; yea and the Citizens of Norwich themselves, hauing certaine knowledge of King Edward's death, forthwith proclaimed Marie for Queene, and presently sent her aide both of men and munition. The Lords then hearing of great preparations, meast by times to ouermatch her in power, and thereupon agreed that Henric Duke of Suffolke their new Queenes Father should with an Army repaire into Norfolke, which thing was so greuous vnto Lady Jane his daughter, that with floods of teares hee obtained his lay.

(7) None then was held sister to vnderge this great businesse, then was the Duke of Northumberland, young Gilford's Father, (who besides his sonnes dignity vnto whom this new Queene was wife) his valliant parts and sufficiency to marshall an Army in Field had been often experienced in Scotland, & but lately among these people with whom hee was now to deale. The Duke thus appointed, began as it should seeme, to mistrust the worth, and thereupon freely vttered his minde to the Lords; wiling them to be carefull at home, as hee would bee venturous abroad, for their cause was common, and all for the Queene. Hee with his (hee said) went now to venture their bodies to the bloody strokes of warre, their Families and Children left to the dispose of others, whom as hee told them if they meant not faire playe, hee could not awake as well as any: thus much and more spoken to the like purpose; one of the Lords replied, and said: Your Grace (as I iudge) doth cast this doubt ouer fast, for which of vs all, can wash our hands cleane of this businesse, therefore it behooveth vs to bee resolute, as much as it doth you, and among them Edward willed that he might goe with him.

(8) All things in a readinesse, and his commission confirmed vnder the broad Seale of England; vpon the 14. of Iuly the Duke with sixe hundred men, accompanied with the Lord Gord, and others, set forth of London, and tooke his way through Shorditch where beholding the countenances of the people, hee spake to the Lord Gord and said. The people, my Lord, presse still to see vs, but not one of them bids vs God speed: the same day likewise Sir John Gates went after the Duke, both of them making for New market, whither further supplies were promised to be sent.

(9) In the meane time the Lord Westmore, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drury, and Sir Edward Hastings raised the Commons of Essex and Gloucestershire, proclaiming Queene Mari euer as they went, the like did Sir John Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlaire in Oxfordshire; and did Sir Thomas Tregheim in the County of Norampton: these with many more made forward toward Norfolke, vnto whom many more joined in the way: and as God and good hap brought it to passe, sixe tall Ships well manned that were appointed before Yarmouth to haue taken Lady Mari if shee had fled; were by foule weather driven into the Hanes, where master Jermingham was raising for her, and asking a Boate to halle them, the Sea-souldiers demanded what he would haue, his answer was their Capitaines, whereunto the Souldiers consented, threatening to throw them into the Sea, if they refused to serue Queene Mari: the Shippes thus gotten and their number augmented, their terror grew fearful to the Lords in the Tower: so while Tenants began then likewise to draw backe, and deny them their side: so that certaine of them would haue bene gone, if by any means they could haue escaped the Tower, which the Lord Treasurer affixed, but was brought acke againe about midnight.

(10) The Duke of Northumberland in as great feare as any, tooke fill his fancies according to his Commission, fending fill to the Lords for their promised fupplies, betwix whom were fuch polling of letters, fuch fpeeding to and fro, fuch outward faire promifes, fuch inward private practises, fuch talking of the Souldiers, and fuch heare-burning of the people, as it was a world to fee: and the rumour of Souldiers from all quarters, daily reforting vnto Queene Marie, made the turmoile much the more. To leaue therefore nothing vnaffaid that might fupport their newe made Queene Iane, the Councell commanded Doctor Ridley Bifhop of London, to maintaine her caufe in his Sermon made at Pauls Crosse, which hee did vpon Sunday the fixteenth of Iuly, but that neither working, nor the peoples affection drawne from the rightfull Succellor, the Lords fell from the Duke, who then was in Berke: and in London proclaimed Lady Mary Queene.

(11) This fudden alteration brought many fadden feares into the Dukes breaſt, whole onely way, as he well ſaw, was to follow the ſtreame, and now returning to Cambridge his Souldiers began to turne in affliction, moſt of them forſaking his company, a few onely excepted, whole perils were deeply engaged with his, where to ſhew his forwardneſſe for the aduancement of Marie, wanting both Trumpet and Herald at hand, himſelfe accompanied with the Maior, and the Marqueſſe of Northampton, in the Market place proclaimed her Queene: which done in token of ioy, hee threw vp his owne Cap. And chaſtice right reuered to whom it belonged, wee will now addreſſe our ſtile to her dreadfull Raigne, wherein the Kingdomeſtory may ſeeme to be writ rather with blood then with ink, and the nurſing mother, (as Queenes by the Prophet are termed and called) to forget the naturall affection due to her Subjects which in ſome fort may bee compared to the children of her wombe.

(12) Yett were her beginnings both milde and gentle, pardoning all offenders in caſe of Lady Iane; excepting the Duke of Northumberland, the onely doer, and Sir Iohn Gates, Captaine of the Guard, who was in Armes againſt her, with ſome few others that worthily ſuffered for that offence. The Duke (as is ſaid) laying downe weapon, and himſelfe proclaiming Reuerend Marie, was neuertheleſſe arreſted with Francis Earle of Huntington in the Kings Colledge at Cambridge by a Sergeant at Armes, but Reters being then lent from the Councell, that every man ſhould be diſmiſſed without further trouble, the Duke among them was alſo releaſed.

(13) The next morning Henric Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell, came into Cambridge from the Queene, who entering his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell vpon his knees, deſiring him for Gods loue to conſider his caſe, that had done nothing without warrant of him, and the Councell; my Lord, ſaid Arundell, I am ſent hither from the Queene to arreſt you, and I, ſaid the Duke, obey your arreſt, yett I beſeech your Lordſhip to vſe mercy towards him whole Acts haue bene no more then was enioyned by commiſſion, that ſooner ſhould you haue fought for, ſaid the Earle, and thereupon committed him to guard, and left him to the mercy of the Queene.

(14) The Duke then with his three ſonnes Iohn, Ambroſe and Henric, the Earle of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gotes, Iohn and Henric, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sanders were conſidered towards London, and brought to the Tower, where the Lord Gifford Dudley, and the Lady Iane his wife, from the high Tiſleot Souerainety were made ſubiekt to diſcreet Priſoners miſeries.

(15) Queene Marie from Frewingham repaired towards London, being all the way ſtaied without any mulikes, ſiuing that many men feared the altering of Religion: at her entrance into the Tower were releaſed Thomas Duke of Norfolk, who had lain there from the laſt of King Henry the eight, Edward Lord Courtney whom three fourth with aduanced Earle of Devonſhire, Carlott Tuſſall Biſhop of Durham, and Stephen Gardiner late Biſhop of Wincheſter, by her then made Lord Chancellor of England, From the Mariſhall ſea was freed Edward Bonner Biſhop of London, and now againe reſtored by the depoling of Doctor Ridley, who for his Sermon lately made, was committed to the Tower; ſo likewiſe Doctor Scorie gaue place vnto Dane, in the Biſhoprick of Cheſter, Miles Courdale vnto Wefſe, in the Biſhoprick of Exeter, and Iohn Haſper vnto Hath, in the Biſhoprick of Worcester; who forthwith was committed to the Fleet, and Archbiſhop Cramer, into the Tower; ſo roughly ſhe began with the reformed Clergy, (how milde ſouer her other proceedings were) in whole diſgrace, Doctor Reuer Chapaine to Banner, made a Sermon at Pauls Crosse which ſo offended his Hearers, that a Dagger was throwne at him, to his great danger, and ſuch threats mottered by the people, as had not Maſter Braſford ſlepped vp in his roome, and perſwaded the people vnto quietneſſe, ſurely it had colt the Preacher his life: which cauſed the Crosse the next Sabbath to bee guarded by the Queenes Guard, whilſt the Preacher ſpake there to the people.

(16) This moued Queene Marie to pot forth a Proclamation againſt thoſe Preachers, and printed bookes; which any wiſe pointed towards the diſgrace of the Papali See, the treaſure whereof had ſtuck in her own breaſt ever ſince her infancy, and ſo much was ſhe deuoted to that of Rome, as being often moued by King Edward, her brother, to embrace the Goſpel according to Lawes in his time eſtabliſhed, with promiſe of her aduancement, by matching her in Marriage with Don Lewis the brother of Ferdinand, her ſonnet was, ſhe had rather to forgoe all earthly preferments, and to looſe all her Lands, and other Liuing, then to change her received opinion of her ſure ſetled Religion.

(17) Her enurance thus ſtanding, and State nothing liſe (as ſhe thought) whilſt the Duke of Northumberland (a Proteſtant) and other his Complices (for the moſt part in daunce) were alive, their arraignment were halſtened, and deaths not long after longed, which they ſuffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill, where the Duke hauing promiſe of life, if he would recant his profeſſion, Daſard-like with Peter, forſooke his maſter, and exhorted the people to the Romiſh profeſſion: which his death Sermon afterwards by authority, came forth in Print. With him ſuffered Sir Iohn Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer much more conſtant as appeared by their ſpeech.

(18) The way (ſith Maſter Foxe) thus made by blood, Queene Marie paſſed through London vnto Weſtmiſter to receiue the Crowne, which was ſolemnly ſet on her Head by Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter, for that both the Archbiſhops were priſoners in the Tower: when a pardon was alſo publiſhed for many offences, which notwithstanding were ſo followed by them in Commiſſion, as ſome were fined, ſome loſt their Fees, ſome caſt into Priſon, and ſome deprived of all their eſtates.

(19) The next that felt the calamities of thoſe times, were the Lady Iane and the Lord Gifford Dudley her Husband, both innocent perſons in that which their Fathers had done: ſhe doubtleſſe was a Lady of admiſſible gifts both in learning, religion, and humane knowledge, as by her conference with Fetchem, letters to an Apollata, exhortation to her Siſter, and praiers by her made in moſt feeling manner, doe evidently appeare, and that there was conſtrained to conſent to the things done is manifeſt by a letter ſent to her father a litle before her death: wherein, after a holy and doſtall exhortation vnto patience, ſhe vſeth this Speech. My deare Father (if I may without offence write in mine owne miſſe-ſpoken me secmes in this I may account my selfe blefled, that washing my hands with the innocencie of my fault, my guilt-less blood may ere before the Lord, merite, merene, to the to merent. And yet though I must acknowledge, that being comforted, and as you was well enough, continually ajured, as taking upon me, I seemed to comfort, and therein offendeth. Queen and her Laver: yet doe I assure reasse that that more offence towards God is much the leife, on that being in former estate as I was, more unforgettable have never agreed with more innocent hearts.

(20) Yet must the Law for so great an offence take place for trall whereof this late titled Queene, and now miserable Lady, was brought into Guildhall in London, where there with the Lord Guisford, Archbishop Crammer, and the Lord Amberst Dudley, were arraigned and condemned. But Crammer (as has faith) was acquit of Treason, and stood onely in the case of Doctrines, which then was accounted He-resie, and so againe were returned to the Tower, for whom great lamentations were made, especially for the good Lady Jane, whose state the Queene her-selfe so pitied, as that ther had the liberty of the Tower to walke in the Queens Garden, and on the Hill, and surely had not her Father as his first offence fallen into another, shee had bene (as was thought) pardoned of life.

(21) His second offence was, that whereas Queene Mary had a purpose to marry with the Spaniard, and to that ende embraced the Suite of Philip, the Sonne of Charles the Emperour, many awell Nobles at thence disliked the Match, fearing not only the change of Religion, whereas many of them blood very well affected, but even of the Lands severall into strangers, as was likely to happen, both in the Husband and Issue. To prevent which this Henry Duke of Suffolke but lately pardoned of life, secretly departed unto Leicester and Warwickshire, making Proclamations for the abandoning of strangers, and instigated the People to withstand the Queens marriage agreed upon with Philip.

(22) These furies thus abroad, the Earle of Huntington was sent into those parts, who taking Cromwell (which Cite Suffolke thought himselfe sure of) foretold the Countrey in such wise, as the Duke for his best refuge committed himselfe to the trull and secret keeping of a servant of his, called Underwood, remaining in Abbot Park, who against the trull repulped treacherously betrayed him, and his brother John Lord Grey, unto the Earle; whence presently by him they were consigned Prisoners unto the Tower of London, their other brother Lord Thomas escaping in the dead of the night, was presently apprehended in the borders of Wales, and from thence was brought Prisoner to London.

(23) This (I say) seemed to hasten the death of those innocents, whom their Fathers had doubly brought into danger, for the Statute of those times, knowing their Queene could have no quiet whilst these great opposites were reared against her, held it best policy to take them away, whereupon the twelfth of February and first day of the weeke, Lord Guisford Dudley was had to the Scaffold upon Tower Hill, and there with prayers and great penitencie ended his life: whose body all bloody laid in a Cart together with the Head wrapped in a cloth was brought into the Chappell within the Tower, even in the sight of this sorrowfull Lady, a spectacle most deadly then to the Axe of her death. And now her own part next to be acted, the Stage of her Tragedy was raised upon the Greene, within the Tower, wherein being mounted with a cheerefull counsenance, and a patient minde, these words with great constancy she spake at that present.

(24) Good people, I am come to die, and by "Law I am condemned to the same, my offence against the Queens Highnesse was onely in con"sent to the desire of others, which now is deemed "Treason: yet it was never of my seeking, but by "counsel of those who should seeme to have further understanding of things then I, which knew "little of the Law, and much lesse of Titles to de-"Crowne. But touching the procurement and de"fire thereof by mee, or on my behalfe, I doe walke

"my hands in innocency thereof before God, and "the face of you all this day: And therewith shee "wring her hands wherein shee had a Bocke. I pray you "all good Christian people (said shee) to beare
"mee witnesseth that I die a true Christian woman, "and that I looke to be saved by none other means "but onely by the mercy of God, in the blood of "his onely Sonne Iesus Christ, and I confesse that "when I did know the word of God, I neglected the "same, and loved my selfe and the world, and there"fore this plague and punishment is sully and wor"thily happened upon me for my faults, and yet I "thanke God of his goodnesse, that hee hath given "me a time and reprieve to repent. And now good "people while I am alive, I pray you assist me with "your prayers.

(25) Then kneeled shee downe, and said in English the fifty one Psalm: and againe standing up, gave her booke to Master Brigden, then Lieutenant of the Tower: then vowing her Gowne, the executioner offered to helpe, whom shee desired to for-beare, and so turning to her two Gentlemen was disrobed of that and her other Attires. This done, the Headman kneeled downe and asked her forgive-nesse, unto whom shee said, the Lord forgive thee, and I doe; and I pray thee dispatch mee quickly, and kneeling againe, said will you take it off before I lye downe? hee answered, no Madam. Then shee tied a handkercher over her eyes, and feeling for the blocke said, where is it, where is it? it is layne her Necke upon the same stretched forth her body and said, Lord lesse unto thy hand I commend my spirit; which was scarcely uttered before shee received the fatal stroke of the Axe: and then ended the life of this chaste, innocent, and most vertuous Lady: whose case through the severity of the Law adjudged accordingly, yet was her death much lamented of all, but most especially greivous unto him that gave the sentence of the same, even Judge Morgan, who thereupon presently fell madde, and in his ravings continually cryed, take away the Ladie Jane from me, and in that horror shortly ended his life.
I will not asouch that shee was with childe at the day of her death, though it was so reported, but rather judge a more Christian-like proceeding against so great a person, though the time (as we well know) proved very bloody.

(26) Eleven daies after her death, her Father Henry Duke of Suffolke, was executed upon the Tower hill, even the twenty three of February where her most Christianly made profession of his Faith, and with great repentance of his fault received the stroke of death: and the three and twenty of April following, his brother the Lord Thomas Gry suffered death in the same place.

(27) That the intended marriage with Philip of Spain, was the cause of their last infurrection we have said; to perwade which, how eloquently foerer had bene delivered by Stephen Gardiner, Lord Chancellor, unto the Nobility in the Chamber of Peacence, setting forth the honour, the riches, and augmentation of Titles to the Crowne, and Kingdome of England: yet was it distasteful to most of their Stomackes, in so much that combinations were made against the process, and many in many places up in Armes: whereof Sir Thomas Hyt of Kent, was the first and last upon this occasion.

(28) Among many delinkers of the Queens marriage it chanced, one, for some other offence, to be committed to the Fleet by the Council, who being an inward acquaintance of Wyates, was persuaded by him to have recured the conspiracy, whereupon he put himselfe in action before the enterprise was altogether ripe, and accompanied with Thomas Bliss, and others, at Windsor in Kent, published a Pro-

January 25.

Pro-

Myt commeth to Rochester.

Proclamation against the Queene's marriage, alledging the thraldome wherunto the Land would become subiect, by that Spanishe march, and from Middleham accompanied with Sir George Harper hasted to Rochester, where they forthwith brake downe the Bridge.

(29) In the meane while Sir Henry Isleie, Anthony and William Knevet, brethren, in East, and West Kent, perswaded the people (who were willing y-nough) to take part with Wyat, for at Milton, Christopher Roper, in making Proclamation for the Queene, assisted by Master Tuck and Durrell, both Iustices of Peace, were all three taken and conveyed vnto Rochester, and there retained Prisoners by Sir Thomas Wyat, whereupon Sir Robert Southwell high Sheriffe of Kent, with the Lord Aburgawney and others, vpon the market day at Malling in a peaned Oration exhorted the hearers from such lechituous enterprizes. On the other side Sir Henry Isleie at Tunbridge, proclaimed the said Lord, the Sheriffe and their adherents, Traitors to God and the Crowne. Thus was Kent diuided, and preparations made to maintain the faction, according as the Gentlemen stood diuersly affected.

(30) The Lord of Aburgawney with the Sherif, and others, hearing that Sir Henry Isleie, and the two Knevetts, conductors of five hundred Welshmen, meant their March vnto Rochester, to ioyne with Wyat against the Duke of Norfolke, who was then come to Gravefild with five hundred Londoners in the quarrell of the Queene, to intercept that designe early the next morning, they marched with many Kentish yeomen vnto Barron-green, a place that lay directly in their passage to Rochester, where ordering their men haied the approach of the Enemy, who seeing themselves thus forlaid, turned secretly aside into another by-way, and gotten vnto Wretham-hall supposing they had beene quit of all danger, displayed their Ensignes.

(31) The Queene's friends thus defeated, were in a marvellous rage, & hasting forward overtooke Sir Henry, & the two Knevetts before they could ascend the height of the Hill, where presently began a most hot skirmish, many wounds given, & many Prisoners taken, till lastly the seditious were scattered, and fled; Sir Henry Isleie into Hampshire, and others into other parts, a few escaping to ioyne with their Consorts.

(32) The beginning thus vnfortunate, made many to misdoubt of the end, among whom Sir George Harper got from Wyat, and submitted himselfe to the Duke of Norfolke, who with Sir Henry Terningham Captaine of the guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir Iohn Fox and others, vpon Monday the twenty sixten of January, came vnto Strand neere Rochester, and there being busied in planning of his Ordinance, was certainly told that the Londoners meant to betray him: whereat fore astounded and turning about, he saw Captaine Bret, and the band of white Coates at his backe, crying, we are all Englishmen, we are all Englishmen: which suddaine conspiracy caused the Duke and the Captaine of the Guard, to shift for themselves, and left their vassallfull followers, to the dispose of their owne affections vnto Wyat: among whom Sir George Harper lastly recovered of the Duke, lightly turned againe vnto Wyat. This Duke (saith Grassius) being an aged man, and fortunate before in all his warres, vpon this distasture impressed such dolour of mind, that for verie griefe thereof he liued not long after.

(33) Wyat, and his associates greatly encouraged by this new supply, with eight hundred Peeces taken of the Queene, besides other of their owne, marched the next morning vnto Crooking Caille, where the Lord Cobham then lay, and bending their Ordinance against the Gate, broke it open with their thor, and made entrance for their men. The Lord Cobham right valiantly resisted their doings, and bestowed freely such small manition as he had, against their becalls, euen with his owne hands: in which enterprize two of his men were slaine, and Wyat after some talke had with the said Lord departed vnto Gravefild, and, where hee with his men were lodged that night.

(34) The next day hee came vnto Dartford, whither resorted Sir Edward Hastings Master of the Horse, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis Knights, both of them being priuie Counsellors to the Queene. Their comming signified, Sir Thomas Wyat with certaine Gentlemen went forth to meet them, Wyat somewhat marching before the rest with a partizan in his hand, at whose approach Sir Edward Hastings alighted, and spake vnto him as follo weth.

"(35) The Queene Maketh requirith to vnderstand the true cause, wherefore you have gathered in Armes her large people against her, which is the part of a Traitor, and yet in your Proclamation you call your selfe a true Subiect, both which cannot stand together. I am no Traitor (quoth Wyat) and the cause why I have assembled the people, is to defend the Realme from danger of being overrunne by Serangers, which must needs follow, if the marriage take place. Why said the Counsellors, there is no stranger yet come, either for power or number whom you need to suspect, therefore if that thing onely be the quarrell, will you that dislike the marriage, come to communication touching the cause, and the Queene is content you shall be heard. To that I yeeld said Sir Thomas Wyat, but for my farther surety, I will rather bee trusted then truit, and thereupon demanded (as some haue written such Hallowsed) the Custody of the Tower and her Grace within it, as also the displacing of some Counsellors about her, and to place other in their Roomes: To which the Master of the Horse replied: Wyat, be fore thou shalt haue thy traitorous demand granted, thou shalt die and twenty thousand with thee, and so these Agents departed to the Court, and Wyat forthwith came vnto Despoyl by Greenwich.

(36) At whose approach so neere London, such feares were possessed, that besides those in the Court (who infligated the Queene to remove into the Tower) the Lord Maior, Aldermen, and most of the Citizens were in Armour, and the Sergeants and Lawyers at Westminster Hall pleaded their causes in Harnesse, at which time it was no need to bid the Spanish Ambassadors be gone, who no more standing to woe for their master, made away by water as fast as they could: and yet some comfort was concluded by the certaine aewes of the discomfiture of the Caueins and Gibbs, that were making head in the West wholly defeated, and fled: which was proclaimed in London vpon Candlemas Eue: vpon the day of that feast Queene Mary to make the City sure on her side, came vnto the Guild-Hall, accompanied with many Courtiers, whither likewise were assembled the Lord Maior, the Aldermen, and the chiefe Citizens in their Lieries: the Queen being placed and all men attending her pleasure, with verie good grace, and words well vttered, shee spake in effect as heere insoeth.

"(38) In my owne person I am come vnto you to tell you that, which you felmes already doe see, and know, I meane the traiterous and ieditious number of the Kentish Rebels, that are assembled against vs and you. Their pretence (as they say) is to resist a marriage betwene vs: ad the Pelage of Spain, of all their pious pretended quarrels, and euill contriued Articles, you haue beene made priuie. Since which time, our Councell haue resorted to the Rebels, demanding the cause of their continued enterprize, by whole answers the marriage is found to bee the least of their quarrell: or rather a cloake to cooer their pretended purposes against our Religion: for, swearing from their former Articles, they now manifestly bewray the inward Treason of their hearts, most arrogantly de-

Wyat at Waltham coming to Calton.

"manding the possession of our person, the keeping "of our Tower, and not onely the placing and dis"placing of our Counsellors: but also to vse them "and vs as their pleasures: what I am louing Sub"iects, you right well know, your Queene, to whom "at my Coronation, when I was wedded to the "Reaine, and to the Lawes of the same (the spou-"falling whereof I haue on my finger, which neuer "hitherto was, nor hereafter shall be left off) ye pro"mised your allegiance, and obedience vnto mee.
 "And that I am the right, and true inheritor to the "English Crowne, I not onely take all Christen-"dome to witness, but also your Acts of parliaments "confirming the same. My Father (as you all know)
 "possessed the regall estate by right of inheritance,
 "which now by the same right is defended vnto "mee: to him you alwaies shewed your felicitie both "faithfull and louing Subjects, as to your liege "Lord and King, and therefore I doubt not but "you will shew your felicitie to me his daughter;
 "which if you doe, then may you not suffer any "rebell to vsurpe the Government of our Person, "or interpose our estate, especially to presumpe
 "ous a traitor as this Wyat hath shewed himselfe "to be: who most certainly, as he hath abused our "ignorant Subjects, to be adherens to his traitorous "quarrell, so doth he intend by the colour of the "same, to subdue the lawes to his will, and to giue "scope to the rascall and folsome persons, to make "generall havoc and spoile of your goods. And "this I say further vnto you in the word of a "Prince, I cannot tell how naturally a mother lo-"ueth her children, for I was neuer the mother of a "son, but certainly if a Prince and Governour may "as naturally loue the Subjects, as the mother doth
 "her child, then assure your felicitie that I being "your Soueraine, Lady, and Queene, doe as car-"nally and tenderly loue and fauour you. And I
 "thus louing you, cannot but think, that you as har-"tily & faithfully loue me again, & so this loue boud "together in the knot of concord, wee shall be able "to doe not, to giue these rebels a short and speedy "ouerthrow. Now as concerning my intended "marriage, you shall vnderstand that I entered not "into the treaty thereof, without the aduice of our "pryuy Councell, yea and by assent of those, to whom
 "my father committed his trust, who haue so con"sidered the great commodities that may thereto en"sue, as they not onely haue thought it very hono"rable, but also expedient, both for the Weighth of "our Reaine, and also of our louing Subjects. But "as touching my selfe (I assure you) I am not so "sious of wedding, neither am so perclitly wedded "to my will, that either for mine owne pleasure I will "chooſe where I list, or also amorous, as needs I "shall haue doe: for I thanke God (to whose be-"the praise) I haue hitherto liued a Virgine, and "doubt not but with Gods grace to be able to "live so still. But if (as my Progenitors haue done "before, it might please God that I might leaue "some fruit of my body to be your Governour, I "trust you would not onely reioyce therein, but also "I know it would be to your great comfort: and cer"tainly if I either did know or thinke, that this mar"riage should either turne to the danger or losse of "any of you my louing Subjects, or to the detriment "of any part of the roiall Estate of this English Reine, "I would neuer consent thereto: neither would I "ever marry whilst I liued. And in the word of a "Queene, I promise and assure you, that if it shall "not probable appeare before the Nobility and "Commons in the high Court of Parliament, that "this marriage shall be for the singular benefit and "commoditie of the whole Reaine, that then I will "abstaine not onely from this marriage, but also "from any other. Wherefore good Subjects plucke "vp your hearts, and like true men stand fast
 "your lawfull Prince against these Rebels, both ours "and yours, and fcare them not, for (I assure you) I

"doe not: and will leaue with you my Lord Howard, "and my Lord Tresawer to be Assaunt with my "Lord Maioir for the safeguard of the City from "spoile & lackage, which is the only scope of this re"bellious Company.

(37) The Oration ended, and the Citizens well "pleased, Queene Marie with good content returned "to the Court, where conferring with her Councell, "she ordained the Lord William Herbert Earle of Pen-"brooke general of the Field, and gave forth by Pro"clamation, that whoeuer could bring Wyat either "quicke or dead, should be rewarded with an hun"dred pound Lands by yere, to him and his posterity "for euer.

(38) Wyat in Defford, and knowing what was "done, with foureteen Ensignes, and foure thousand "strong, vpon Saturday the third of February mar"ched towards London, at whose approach, the white "Tower hauing him in danger shot off her Ordinance, "but did misse their mark, some kelling too farre "ouer, and some as much too short. His entrance in"to Southwarke was peaceable and without all resist-"tance, though many Country men were therein be-"lieued to withstand his coming, who contrary to "trust, iyned with the Kentish, and then to winne the "hearts of the people, he presently made Proclama"tion that no Souldier should take away any thing "without due payment, and the parties consent: not"withstanding Witchester house (some felt the contrarie, "whose goods were manaked, the Bookes in the "Librarie cut and defaced, and not a lock left vpon
 "the doores: such spoiles infurrections euer syne "as, how faire sooner they, foyle the glasse to the "light.

(39) The Suburbs thus his, he assured himselfe "the City likewise shortly would be, but coming to "the Bridge, he found the Gates fast shut, neither any "in haile to open them for him, therefore making a "trench at the Bridge foote, placed two peeces of "Ordinance against the Gate: At Saint Georges Church
 "he mounted another, the fourth at the entrance into "Harmondsworth streete, and the fifth towards the Bishop "of Witchester house.

(40) Within the City the Lord Maioir, and Lord
 "William Howard, caused the draw bridge to be cut "downe, and making fortifications for their defence, "placed great Ordinance against the entrance. Wyat
 "still thirsting to know the Cities intent, got with "some few followers through the Porters lodge vnto
 "the draw bridge, where being vnto himselfe, he saw "the passage too difficult to haue friendly access,
 "and therupon said to his companions, this place is too "hot for vs. Besides the Tower began to be copped "with Ordinance, seven Culuerings and Demie "Canoons, levelled against the Bridgefoote, the Stee"ples of Saint Olives, and Saint Mary Awaris, all the "White Tower laden with her peeces, three fauconets "ouer the water-Gate, and a double Culuering vpon "Disabling Tower: and all these were turned and fear"fully charged vpon the Borough of Southwarke, "which seene, the Inhabitantes with great lamenta"tions came vnto Wyat, and complained, that for his "cause they were like to be utterly vndone: who brack"en with pittie and remorse of so many, presently "renowned his Arme towards Kingsfrow vpon Thames, "where finding the Bridge broken downe, with Lad"ders and Planks he soone repaired it, and so passing "the river the same night, came to Brinsford before "hee was desired by the Queenes Scouts, the newes "whereof sore troubled the Court. Wyats hopes "were to haue surprized the Citie vpon the suddaine,
 "and therefore made such haile as he did, but being "hindred by a Peeces of great Ordinance that was "dismounted from the carriage, came not vnto "Knights bridge before it was day.

(41) In the same morning the Earle of Penbrooke
 "Lord General had taken Saint James Fields, whither "Wyat and his in good order marched, but seeing the "way dolefull both with foote and horsemen, turned downe the old lane directly towards Saint James, whence Captaine Vaughan with two Esquiers tooke towards Weyminster, and Wyat along the caufey leading to Charing-Crosse, the Lord Generall Horsem, hitherto mood boewing aloofe, until the enemy was passed, all but the taile, vpon which they violently set, and severed from the rest, the maine neuer looking backe to release their distress.

(42) From the higher ground, and along the high way the great Ordinance plaid, and Wyat againe answered the like, though with small hurt to either, only one from the Hill flew three of Wyat men in a rancke, and brake through the Brick-wall into the Parke. Wyat passing forward by the battell of footmen without any impeachment, came to Charing-Crosse, where the Lord Chamberlaine and Sir John Gage, stood ready to resist him: but Kentish Souldiers rushing violently into the streets, forced them into the gates of White-hall which presently were shut, and report in the Court that the Lord Generall was resolved to Wyat, all so distracted that none durst trull others, and no other voice therein heard, but Treason, Treason. Menne while Wyat with such small company as hee had, halsted through Fleetstreet, and came vnto Ludgate, where hee knocked to haue entrance, and well hoped of further assistance, but was farre deceived, the gate being guarded against him, with a number of true Citizens and bands of the Queenes friends.

(43) But those straglers that had taken into Weyminster, whereof Knowes was Capitaine, seeking to recover their companions, came before the Court gates, and there made their stand, which being shut against them shot many of their arrowes into the Garden, yea and into the windowes of White-hall, though without any hurt: from the Court thus guarded against them, they forthwith departed, meaning to follow Wyat their Leader into London, and marching forward, were met with at Charing-Crosse, by Sir Henry Terningham, Capitaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the Ordinance, and Sir Philip Perri Knights, sent thither by order of the Lord Generall, with a band of Archers, and certaine Field peeces to secure the Court, their Artillery discharged, they presently ioine fight with the Rebels at pulse of the Pike, who a while stucke to it magnifuly: in which conflikt was thetrall of the day: but as their quarrell was traitorous, so their hearts were loone quelled, each one saving himselfe by flight, wherein about twenty of those bearded Souldiers were slaine, and no other crye heard, but downe with the Doggettales.

(44) Wyat returned from Ludgate, late downe vpon a stall against the common lane called Bevisage, where hee beganne (as it should seeme) to expostulate what his heady rashnesse had done, and the vaine hopes hee had conceived of the Citizens abgements, who seldome tooke part against the Crowne: he then despairing of further successe, retired backe towards the Court, and was not staine until hee came to Temple-Barre, where certaine Horsem men coming from the field, met him full in the face, betwixt whom began some bickering, till lastly Clarentius King at Armes came to him and said Master Wyat you see the day is gone against you; and in resisting you doe doo no good, but hazard the death of your Souldiers, and your life, to the great perill of your soole. My counsell is, that you were best to yelde, and perchance you may finde the Queene mercifull, if you stay from further bloodshed.

(45) Wyat heereat somewhat astonished, seeing now his whole designs defeated (though his few Souldiers were bent till to fight) answered the Herald, Well then, if I must needs yelde, I will yelde to a Gentleman: to whom Sir Maurice Barkley came presently and bad him mount his Horse behinde, in like manner another tooke vp Sir Thomas Cobham, and the third Thomas Knowes, and so caried them vnto the Court, whence in the afternoone, they with the two Manteis, and Alexander Brett, were committed to the Tower, Sir Thomas Wyat wearing a shirt of Male vnder a velvet Casbocke, and the windlace of his Dagge hanging about his necke. The next day eleven Gentlemen more of name and account, were likewise committed to the Tower. In London about fifty persons were hanged for Wyats conspiracy, and foure hundred more led through the Citle with halters about their neckes to Weyminster, where in the Tilt-yard they were all pardoned by the Queene, pronouncing her mercy from the Gallies above.

(46) But the Capitall offender Sir Thomas Wyat arraigned at Weyminster vpon case of high Treason, confessed the inditement and had judgement of death accordingly, which he suffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill the eleuenth of April following; his words to the people were these, " Good people I am come hither perfectly to die, being there-fore offended against God and the Queenes Majesty: I trust God hath forgiven mee, and will take mercy vpon me: I beseech the Queenes majesty alio of forgiveness (hee hath forgiven you quoth Doctor Weston) let euerie man beware how hee taketh any thing in hand against the higher powers, vntil God be propitiable to his purpose, it will neuer take good effect or successe, whereof you may now learne by me, and I pray God I may be the last example in this place. But whereto is said and noised abroad, that I should accuse the Lady Elizabeth and the Lord Courtney, it is not so, good people: For I assure you, neither they, nor any other now yonder in hold was praisie to my rising before I began, as I have declared no lesse to the Queenes Councell, and that is most true. They said Doctor Weston, marke heere my masters, heith that, that which he hath shewed to the Councell in writing of them, is most true. Whereupon Wyat put off his Gowne, his dabler, and waistcoat, and knitting a kercheife ouer his eyes with most feruent praying, received the stroke of the Axe.

(47) Alexander Brett, and twenty two Kentish persons besides, were executed in diuers parts of that County others were likewise arraigned for the same Conspiracy, as Sir Nicholas Threshemorton, and Sir James Cress the one quit by his laquey, the other pardoned of life by the Queene. Many others were suspected as aiders vnto Wyat, and his enterprize, among whom the Lord Courtney, and the Princesse Elizabeth, sister to the Queene, were not the least, and therefore both of them committed to the Tower: of which Ladies troubles, innocency, and truth, thus we find related.

(48) These Virgine Princes were not so neerely linked in blood and nature, as they were separated asunder in affecting Religion, and that being the prime cause for which these comotions were raised, Queene Mary much suspected her sister to be a principall mouer therein. The ielousie whereof, Gardiner of Winchester did further inflame, by blowing Coniectures into her eare: so that needing the Princesse must be sent for, then lying sicke at her Mannour of Aldridge, even the next day after that Wyat tole. The messengers were, Sir John Willoughby, Sir Edward Hastings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, all three Priole Counsellors, with a troope of Horsem men in number two hundred and fifty.

(49) These coming to Aldridge at tenne in the night, suddenly ascended into her Priole Chamber, and making it knowne they came from the Queene, had present access into her Bed-Chamber; where the said Lady lay very low sicke: their first salutations were, that they were sorry to see her in that estate, and I am not glad said she, to see you here at this time of the night: Madame, quoth they, our Message requires haste, and the Queenes pleasure is, that you shall bee at London the leuenth of this month meth. No Creature gladder to come to her Maiefty then I (said Lady Elizabeth) being right forry that I am not in case at this time to attend her Grace, as your felues here see. Indeed (said they) for that we see, we are heartily forry, but our commission is, that we bring you to London either quicke or dead, wherat the being greatly amazed, sorrowfully said, she wel hoped these commissions was nothing to strait, but they calling for two Doctors of Physicke demanded whether shee might be removed with life, and that being refused, had her prepare against the next morning and so left this innocent Princesse very perplexed there of the night.

(50) The next morning approached, and shee in no better plight, notwithstanding was led forth more like a Prisoner than a Prince, which the people in every place as shee passed, did much lament, and strongly guarded, was so conveyed vnto the Court, where for foureteen daies space, shee comfortlesly continued without sight of friends, the Queene or any Lords, those onely excepted that attended the doores, which were the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir John Gage.

(51) Vpon Friday before Palme Sunday, Gardiner of Winchester, and nine more of the Councell, came into her presence, and there charged her both with Wyatt Conspiracy, and the stirres lately made in the West parts by Sir Peter Carew and others, which they most constantly denied: but in conclusion they told her it was the Queenes pleasure, that shee should forthwith goe to the Tower, the name of which dolefull prison stricke deepe to her heart. I trust (said shee) her Maiefty will be farre more gracious then to commit to that place a true and most innocent woman, that neuer had offended her in thought, worde nor deed. And thereupon instantly desired those Lords to bee a meane for her vnto the Queene: which some of them promised, and much pitied her case. But about an houre after, came foure of these Lords againe, namely, Winchester, the Treasurer, the Steward and Saffix: with a charge to discharge her of all attendants, lauing onely her Gentleman Vther, three Gentlewomen, and two Groomes of her Chamber, the Guard was set to ward in the next roomes; two Lords with bands of men to watch in the Hall, and two hundred Northern white Coates in the Garden, thus all was made fute, and she kept from stirring.

(52) The next day came vnto her two Lords of the Councell with commandement from the Queen to haue her to the Tower, they roundly told her, her Barge was prepared, and that the tide would carry for no body: this heauy newes increased this distressed Ladies penfullnesse, who in most humble wile became Petitioner vnto their Lordships, that shee might stay vntill the next tide, which as she wel hoped, would procure more comfortable; but the one of them being more forward in his Commission then the other, staid told her that neither tide nor time should bee delayed. Whereupon her Grace desired they might write to the Queene: he againe answered, that her durst not suffer it, neither in his iudgement was it convenient: but the other more mild (which was the Earle of Saffix) kneeling down told her that her Grace should haue liberty to write her mind: swearing as hee was a true man, himselfe would deliver it into the Queenes hand, and bring her the answer, whatsoever case it: which honourable permission was then most thankfully taken, and afterward most highly esteemed in her Princely fauours towards that honourable man: but in writing this letter of petition to the Queene, the Tide was turned, and serued not to shoote the bridge with a Barge; therefore it was priuily determined to take the advantage of the next, which with better aduise was againe deferred, for that it fell about midnight, whence rose a feare that shee might bee forcibly taken from them before shee came to the Tower: and so with great providence was that danger prevented.

(53) The next day being Palme Sunday, serued well for their purpose, when as vnder pretext of deuotion, the Citizens of London were commanded to carry their Palmes to the Church, whilst her Barge might be passed by without fight or any suspected. And to that purpose the foresaid two Noble men about nine of the Clocke repaired vnto her, shewing that the time was now come, that her Grace must goe to the Tower; to which shee answered, the Lords will be done I am contented: seeing it is the Queenes mind: and coming into the Garden to take Barge, shee call her eyes towards euerie Window, hoping to see somethat would pity her case, but that also failing, she sighed and said, I marvel what the Nobility mean to suffer me a Prince to be led into Captivity, the Lord knowes whether, for my selfe shee do not.

(54) Great haste was made to the barge, and as much to get by London vnscare: but the tide yong and not fully come in, the fall of the water at the Bridge was so great, as the Barge men themselves feared to passe thereunder, and motioned a day till the streame were more leuell. which in no wise would bee heard: whereupon they passed the Arch with such danger, as the sterne of the boate brucke against the ground, and come to the staires, could not take land without stepping into the water, which this tender, and newly recovered Princesse was forced to doe, in which passage she vttered these wordes: I speake before thee O God, hauing none other friend but thee onely; here I land as true a subject, being prisoner, as ever landed at these staires: to which the seuerall Lords answered, if it were so, it was the better for her. Shee come into the gate, a great number of Seruants and Warders of the Tower stood to guard her, through whom as shee passed, the poore men kneeling downe with one voice, desired God to preserve her Grace, whereof some were rebuked, and others put from their Ordinarie the next day.

(55) Then passing somewhat further both faint and vncomfortable, shee rested her selfe vpon a cold stone, to whom M. Bridger the Lieutenant then being said: Madam, you were best to come out of the raine, for you sit vnwholesomely; to whom shee replied, better sitte here then in a worse place, for God knoweth and not I, whether you will bring me: at which her sortowfull and decided answer, her Gentleman Vther, a seruant most loyall and loving to his Mistresse, among many others brake forth into floods of teares, the witness commonly of inward griefe, which the Princess perceiving, reproued, demanding what he meant for to discourage her, seeing shee tooke him to bee her Comforter, & especially knowing her truth to be such, as that no man should haue any cause to weepe for her.

(56) Shee satlele belowd, and the doores made fast with lockes and bolts, was there comfortlesse left in the dolefull prison, where calling for her booke and her few seruants about her, shee fell vnto prayers, desiring God to prosper her worke, that she might build vpon the rocke Christ: whereby these blushing tempests thus suddenly risen might not preuaile against her foundation. Meanwhile the Lords were as circumspect, how shee might be kept sure; many among them propounded, that it was most needfull shee should bee close prisoner, and a strong guard set to watch her doores; against which the Lord Saffix replied and said: My Lords let vs take herd vnto we goe not beyond our Commission, for we are our Kings Daughter, and we knowe the Prince must be blood, therefore let vs so deale with her now, that if it so happen, we may distress our doings vnto her another day.

(57) Two dayes spent thus in the Tower, and Gods diuine seruice celebrated in English, it was commanded to haue Masse in her lodgings, and to that end two of her yeomen were appointed to answer the Priest, which was as willingly done as the deuotion was small. Then were the fauourites examined, yea and some of them with torture, & all to finde a fitter knife to cut her innocent thoroate, that fo Wincheſter might with his white Rocher in her purple blood; who being Lord Chancellor and Ruler of the reſt, came into the Tower to examine her himſelfe, with ſome others of the Queene Council: Shee then brought before them, was demanded of the talke ſhee had with Sir James Croſſe (a priſoner in the Tower, and then brought to her preſence) concerning her removing from Aſbridge vnto Dunmington Caſtle: My Lords (ſaid ſhee) mee thinks you doe mee wrong to examine euery meane Priſoner againſt meſſe they haue done euill let them anſwere for it, I pray you ioyne mee not with ſuch offenders; as touching my remoue to Dunmington, mine officers, and you Sir James Croſſe can tell; but what is this to the purpoſe, might I not, my Lords, goe to mine owne houſes at all times? whereunto the Lord of Arundell kneeling downe, anſwered that her Grace ſaid truth, and that himſelfe was forry to ſee her troubled about ſuch vaine matters; well my Lords (ſaid ſhee) you liſt mee narrowly, but you can doe no more then God hath appointed, vnto whom I pray to forgive you all.

(19) During which time there vſually repaired vnto her a little boy, about foure yeeres of age (a mansſonne of the Tower) in whole pretty praſling ſhee tooke great pleaſure; his vie was to bring her flowers, and to receiue at her hands ſuch thinges as commonly pleaſe Children; which laſtly brought a great ſuſpition into the Lord Chamberlaine working head, that by this Child letters were brought betwixt the Princes Elizabeth, and the L. Courtney, whereupon the boy was threatened, and his father commanded not to ſuffer him any more to reſort to her Grace; which notwithstanding, the next day hee did, but the doore being ſhut, and hee perping through a hole, cried vnto her, Miſtreſſe I can bring you ſo more flowers now.

(20) It was reported (ſaith Foxe) if the relation be true, that a Write ſubſcribed vnder certaine Councellors hands, was directed for the preſent death of the Lady Elizabeth, which hee doth wholly impute vnto Wincheſter working: This ſodaine charge giuen for her preſent execution, fore grieved M. Bridges then Lieutenant of the Tower, who forthwith repaired vnto the Queene, to know her further pleaſure therein: but ſhee being altogether ignorant of any ſuch warrant, blamed the doers and gaue a contrary command, whereby was preſerued the life of her ſiſter: which howſoeuer (to the diſturbance of her enemies) it was prolonged, yet her State of liues ſecuritie ſeemed little better, and her feares preſently conceiued, were nothing the leſſe: for the Conſtable diſcharged, Sir Henry Scumfield a more ſeuere Taylor was placed in his roome, who with an hundred ſouldiers in blew coates entered vpon his charge: at ſight whereof the fearefull Princes demanded, whether the Scaffold whereon Lady Jane ſuffered was ſtill ſtanding: or whether Sir Henry (a man to her altogether vnknowne) made any conſcience of murder, if hers was committed vnto his charge.

(21) The nineteenth of May her Grace was removed from the Tower towards Woodſtocke, Sir Henry Benfield being her conſultor, vnto whom Sir John Williams Lord Tame was ioined in Commiſſion. The firſt night ſhee was brought vnto Richmond, where all her owne ſeruaunts were removed from her preſence, and the ſouldiers let to attend her perſon; by which ſeuere beginnings the much doubted that her dayes were neere ſpent, and in that place her life muſt take end: whereupon calling together her ſeruaunts deſired them to pray for her, for this night (ſaid ſhee) I thinke I muſt die, which lamentable wordes drew fountains of teares out of their eyes; and thereupon her Gentleman Viller went downe vnto the Lord Tame in the Court, deſiring him vſuaſionally to ſhew, whether his Lady and Miſtreſſe that night were in danger of death, whether by himſelfe and ſollowers might take ſuch part as God would appoint. Mary God forbid quoth the Lord Tame, that any ſuch wickedneſſe ſhould bee intended, which rather then it ſhould bee wrought, I and my men will die at her foot.

(22) With no greater comfort proceeded ſhe towards Woodſtocke: Sir Henry her Taylor (as he termed him) ſeuere carrying ſo hard an hand in his Commiſſion; for the people that with teares preſſed to meet her in the paſſage, and with prayers ſolaced her in moſt louing manner, he both threatened, & draue backe, calling them Traitors and Rebels againſt the Queene and her Lawes, and whereas in certaine villages beſe were rung as they paſſed for joy as they conſidered it of her deliuerance, Sir Henry Benfield tooke the matter ſo diſtastfull, that hee commanded the bells to ſilence, and let the ringers thereof in the ſtocks; ſo that not without cauſe this loſing Lady ſent this word vnto her poore ſeruaunts, and well wiſhing friends, Tamara ſaith as a ſheepe to the ſlaughter, ſo am I lead: And ſurely had not the L. Tame bin more comfortable in his place vnto this diſtreſſed Princeſſe, her ſpirit of hopes had been ſpent before the conduction of her priſon had bene accompliſhed.

(23) Neither in Woodſtocke was her liberty much enlarged, nor frates any leſſe, ſhee being incloſed in none of the beſt lodgings, guarded with ſouldiers both day and night, and although hee had leaue into ſome Gardens, yet were ſix or ſixe lockes betwixt her walke and her lodgings, and all made faſt after her entrance. It was alſo ſuſpected that the Keeper of Woodſtocke a notorious Ruffian was inclined to kill this innocent Princeſſe, as alſo that one Baſſet a Darling of Biſhoppe Gardiners came to Sladenbridge a mile from Woodſtocke, accompanied with twentie men in priuy Coates, carnally deſiring to ſpeake with Lady Elizabeth, pretending ſecret and importunate buſineſſe: but Sir Henry her Keeper goſe to the Court had giuen ſtriſt charge to his brother, that none ſhould haue acceſſe vnto her before his returne, though they came from the Councell or Queene her leiſe. Whereby that deſigne was happy loſt. What his errand was I will not determine, but others haue conceiued it was for no good.

(24) Another accident alſo hapned, whether of purpoſe, or otherwiſe I cannot ſay, but ſurely it was to the danger of her life: for on the ſodain her lodgings were on fire, which beganne to kindle betwixt the boares and ſeeling vnder the Chamber where ſhee lay and was vehemently miſtruſted to be purpoſely done. Theſe and the like feares daily hapning, drew the diſtreſſed Princeſſe into many paſſions; whereof one is reported, that ſhee ſitting ſolitaſy at her Priſon-window, chanced to ſee a Mide of Woodſtocke in the Parke milking of Kine, and as ſhee ſate, moſtly to ſing out her Pale, which ſtrucke this ſad peniſe Priſoner into a deepe meditation, preferring the Maides Iorunes ſaſte about her owne, and heartily wiſhed that her ſelfe were a Milke-maid, into ſuch diſtreſſe was her princely birth brought, in which comfortleſſe thearldome, wee will a while leaue her, & returne to ſpeak of matters in the Court.

A.D. 1553. (61) Queene Mary being now chiefe Pilot het selfe, and set at the helme of all Soueraigne power, herred the Reme of her zealous affection, according to her owne liking, when presently vpon her Coronation beganne a Parliament at Westminster, & a Conocation in the Cathedral Church of Saint Pauls in London, where there commanded a free disposition for Religion, without any danger of offence. The Questions to bee controverted, were concerning a Catechisme set forth in King Edward dayes, and the presence of Christ in the Sacrament of his Supper. For Popish Transubstantiation flood Disputers Doctor Moriman, Doctor Walsley, Doctor Chesley, Master Harsfield, and Master Morgan, D.
Wesley Dean of Westminster appointed for Prolocutor:
For Chreth spiritual preference were M. Hadden, M.
Blumer, M. Chesney, M. Philpot, and Master Ferne, these meeting & seuerall daies disputed only vpon the last question: but with such disagreement, as lastly Q. Mary commanded Henry to dissolve the assembly, without any Subscriptions to the assertions presented.

Decemb. 13. (66) And not long after Thomas Cramer Archbishoppe of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley Bishoppe of London, and Hugh Latimer sometimes Bishoppe of Worcester, were sent from the Tower of London vnto Oxford, to dispute vpon the said Argument against Doctor Tresham, Doctor Cole, Doctor, Oglethorpe, Doctor Hie, Master Harsfield, and Master Feknam, all Oxford men, vnto whom from Cambridge were ioyned Doctor Yauger, Doctor Glinne, Doctor Seton, Doctor Walsley, Doctor Sedgwick, and Doctor Atkinson, Doctor Wesley again being Prolocutor: the disputation beganne vpon the sixteenth of April, and ended the twentieth of the same moneth, with the sentence of those three Bishoppes deaths, which through fire gaue testimony of their faithes, a yere and fixe moneths after in the Towne Ditch of Oxford: whose discourses, letters, and last endes, are largely set down by M. Iohn Fox in his Acts and Moniments of the Church, vnto whom I refer the deuotous Reader, lest by enlarging of the, the course of our temporal Story should bee overmuch interrupted with matters Ecclesiasticall of those sorrow-full times.

A.D. 1554. (67) Queene Mary intending her marriage with Spain, great feares were conceited that many calamities would follow, as well to the Church, reformed from abuses, as for the politike proceedings of the Kingdomes affaires; which as some tooke was prognosticated even from heauen it selfe, by a Raine-bow reuerfed, the bow turned downward, & the two ends standing vppward, as also by two Suns shining at one time, and a good distance asunder in the Skies, both which sights appeared in London the fifteenth of February.

(68) In which City a Parliament to that per-petue was assembled, wherein by Statute the marriage was confirmed, though with so lesse liking of those times observers, then was the marriage desired which is said of the Sonne: to hinder whose purpose, the world is said to haue made suite vnto Iupiter, lest hazing more Sames then one, the whole frame of the Globe should bee set on fire. The distastefull thoughts Queene Mary well perceived, therefore to gine them content, she wrote her letters into the West, and to Wales, charging the Lord President, the Bishopps of Oxford and Salisbury, to intimate the obedience thereof to the whole land, as much as might bee; neither was London forgotten, whose Lord Maior and Common were sent for to the Court, and there by the Lord Chancellor tolde how by this match all the Realm would bee enriched, but especially London by their trade and trafficke with Spain.

(69) Vnto Spain were sent the Earle of Bedford, and the L. Fitzwater to condukt K. Philip into England; the Lord Admirall with twenty eight shippes securing the sea the space of three moeths before:

all things thus ordered, and Philip in a readines took Bark at Cornwall, and with a Naue of an hundred and fifty saile directed his course for his Queene.

(70) Vpon Friday the twentieth of July, hee arrived at Southampton, and was the first man of that Plect that set foot on the shore, which no sooner don, but he drew his Sword, and so bare it naked in his hand as hee went. The Earle of Arundell L. Steward of the Queenes houle, presented to his High-nesse the George and Garter; and the Maior of Southampton the Keyes of the Towne: thither was sent the Lord Chancellor from the Queene, and hee againe sent to his Nobles vnto her, who was on the way vnto Windsor, to welcome him herselfe: towards which City vpon Monday following, hee set forth, being accompanied with the Marquisses of Winchester, the Earles of Arundell, Dorset, Worcester, Bedford, Landau, Penbrooke, and Warry, the Lordes Clinton, Cobham, Willoughby, Darcy, Chetwode, Talbot, Strange, Fitzwatzen, and Norris: besides many Knights and gallant Gentlemen. His Spanish train were the Dukes of Alva, and Medina del, the Admi-rall of Castille, the Marquesses of Bergues, Pfeifer, Soria, Pallas, Agullos, the Earles of Esmond, Horne, Feria, Chancun, Oliveros, Saldana, Medina, Barrosolde, Landriano, Caster, the Bishoppe of Cuenca, and others: so that more honourable attendants had Isidore bene sent.

(71) And surely the Covenants were as honorable for England that were agreed vpon betwixt them, which were branched into tenne Propositions.

1 First was, that Philip should bee stiled King of England during the Maximomy, and should assist his Queene in gouernment, but not dispose of any Landes, Offices, Benefices, or Reuenues in the Realme.

2 That Mary by vertue of this marriage should bee admitted Queene of the Realmes and Dominions of Spain already possessed, as of all others, that were appropriated vnto the same, during the Maximomy.

3 That for Dowry shee should receiue yearly three score thousand pound Flemish, if in case the ordained King Philip her husband.

4 That the Issue proceeding of this marriage either male or female in the right of their mothers inheritance, in the Kingdomes either of England, or other Dominions depending, should succeed in them according to the lawes, statutes, and customes of the same.

5 That if it chanced Charles Duke of Austria, the Infant of Spain to die without Issue, then the eldest sonne of this Maximomy should succeed in all the Dukedomes, Earledomes, Dominions and Patri-moniall lands, belonging vnto Charles the Empe-rouer, father to the Prince of Spain, as well in Burgundy as in the low Countries, in the Dukedomes of Brabant, Luxemburg, Guelderland, Zulphare, Freisland, in the Countiees of Flanders, Artois, Holland, Zeland, Namur, and the land beyond the Rhe.

6 That the Dominions of the low Country, and of Burgundy should be excluded from the Patri-moniall descent of the said Lord Charles, notwithstanding his iustie remained, and should bee enjoyed by the eldest borne of this marriage without further claime to any other Dominions belonging vnto Spain: and the rest of the Children thereof proceeding to haue conuenient portions and Dowry assigned them as well out of those Countiees, as out of England and the others adjoined.

7 That if no issue male were borne of this marriage thru the eldest female should possesse those Dominions, provided that the shold marry a nobleman, either of the low Country or of the Realm of England, otherwise the right of the Succession should re-maine in the Lord Charles, yet not to cut off, but that she with the other daughters begot in this marriage should be endowed of their fathers Lands and possessions, aswell in Spain as in the Low Countries.

8 That for want of Issue by the Lord Charles, and of heire male procreated by this Marriage in that case the Eldest daughter of K. Philip and Q. Marie should succeed both, in the Territories of the Low Countries, as also in the Realmes of England, Spain, and the rest, after the nature, lawes and customes of the same.

9 That who so succeeded, either he or she, yet should the severall Dominions be governed by the Natives borne in the Realmes, wholly and intirely after the priviledges, rites and accustomed manner formerly used.

10 That a sincere fraternity, unitie and peace should be confirmed for ever betwixt these Nations, so as they should mutually aide each other in all things according to the strength, forme and effect treated of at Weymouth, and is subscribed vnto at Frischie.

(72) As these were agreed vpon for the General, so other particulars were articulated with the King himselfe, which were as followeth.

1 That he should not bestow the administration of offices or benefices in the Realme of England, to any stranger or person not borne vnto the English subiectiō.

2 That his Court should be replenished with Gentlemen and Yeomen the Natives of the Land.

3 That hee should make no invasion of state against the Lawes and Customes of the Realme, neither violate the Priviledges thereto belonging.

4 That hee should not carry the Queene out of her owne Dominions, without her speciall desire, nor none of her Children without consent of her Nobilitie.

5 That if shee should die issueles hee should Challenge no right in the Kingdome, but should suffer the succession to come to her neare.

6 That hee should not carry or suffer to be carried out of the Realme, either Jewels, or other things of especiall estimation, but should faithfully keepe them for the profit of the English Crowne.

7 That hee should not suffer any ships, gannes, Ordnance and other maner of warre to be conveyed out of the Realme, but should see all the Forts and Frontiers of the Land kept, and the same sufficiently stored for their defence.

8 That neither directly nor indirectly, the Realme of England should be intangled with the warres of his father, and the French King, neither that himselfe should give any cause for the breach of peace betwixt the two Realmes.

(73) Things thus ordered, with consent of all parties, the marriage with great state was solemnized at Windsor, vpon Wednesday being the 25. of Iuly and Saint James day, where the Emperours Embassadors presently pronounced, that in consideration of this marriage, their master had given vnto his sonne Philip, the Kingdomes of Naples and Ierusalem, where vpon their Titles by Quarter King at Armes, was solemnely proclaimed with these titles as followeth.

Philip and Marie by the Grace of God, King and Queene of England, France, Naples, Ierusalem, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Princes of Spain and Sicill, Archbishops of Austria, Dukes of Milan, Burgundie and Brabant, Counties of Hapsurge, Flanders and Tyrell.

(74) And according to the titles, so was the Majesty of their proceedings, having two Swords borne before them as they went from the Church, with other Imperiall Ensignes of their great Magnificence; which nothing was lessened in their passage through London; where English eyes beheld Philip, after the affections of their owne hearts, some reioicing as Israel, that Ieroboams golden calves should be againe erected, and some following as Isaiah, that the Bruisen Serpent was not broken, all of them assured, that this Solomon succourance and his wives sake, would build againe the Altars that had bene cast downe.

(75) The experience wherof Queene Marie herselfe had given, even before shee was crowned, in causing the Latine Service againe to bee said, in displacing the reformed Bishops, and in publishing a most strait prohibition against preaching, and printing English Bookes: to all which some timorous Church-men gave their consents, scandalizing not onlie the lines of the ministers, but also the Scriptures translation, and the iust proceedings of King Edward at time; against all which, Master Harne in a publicke Sermon made at Pauls Crosse (in the presence of the Lord Maior and Banner his Master) so liberally inveighed, as that one of his Auditors with more dislike then discretion, and more zeale then Religion, threw a Dagger at him to his great danger, and no lesse feare.

(76) And againe the like offence was conceived against Doctor Pradleton, who in the next yeere after, and in the same place had a gunnie desperately discharged against him: vnto such hatred their Doctrine did drine them, and vnto such sinne the over-feruent affectioned lay many times exposed: And no lesse was that Diabolicall deuile of certaine giddie reformers, who had taught a Maide so to speake in a wall, as her hearers beleaved it was the voice of an Angell, being none o-ther, but most seditious speeches, against the Queens proceedings, the Prince of Spain, the Masse, and Confession. In mockage wherof also a Cat was hanged on a gallows nere vnto the Crosse in Cheape, her head thorn and wearing a vesture fashioned like vnto a Cope, her fore-feet tyed with around paper betwixt, like vnto the papisticall consecrated bread in that manner the eight of April was shewed, by the Preacher at Pauls Crosse both to the offence and content of the Spectators; and to deride the ridiculous Idolatries of the time then in vie, vpon Easter day the same yeere, and in the same Cheape, as the Priest of Saint Pancras came to celebrate the resurrection, and after the accustomed manner put his hand into the Sepulchre for the Crucifix (therein purposely bestowed) when hee vied the words of the Euangelist very devoutly: Surrexit enim hee is risen, and not heere: found it so indeed, for that his God was gotten away and could neuer after be found.

(77) These things (saith Fox) caused both the Queene, and bishops, to conceiue an euill opinion of the Lauders; as too much launing of King Edward reformation, for which cause Banner commanded all Scriptures printings vpon their Churches walles, to bee blotted out; and many other intensions to be inquired after. But from these vain trifles let vs returne to more serious matters in the ensuing Historie.

(78) Queene Mari erecting the Masse, and leaning the title of Supremacy to the Pope, sent for her kinsman Cardinall Pole to bee her director in choise great busineses, who had bene a long time in forraigne parts, and euer a favourite vnto the See of Rome, whose life vntill thistime, we will briefly run over, to many dependances of story relying vpon him.

(79) Hee was the sonne of Margaret Countesse of Sauoy, the second childe, and onely daughter of George Duke of Clarence, second brother vnto King Edward the fourth: whose youth was spent in literature at Magdalen Colledge in Oxford; and state instructed by King Henrie his kinsman, in beholding vpon him the Deuiny of Reefiler. Then travelled he into Italy, and at Padu studied seuen yeeres, in which which time the King having abolished the Pope, hee was sent for into England, but refusing to returne, was proclaimed Traitor, and his Deaneery given to another : which his losse was pretensely repaid by his holy Father, in making him Cardinal, & employing him in many Ambassages, both to the Emperour & French King, with whom hee ever dealt against K. Henry, and solicited others by letters to forsake his friendship and obedience, which his doing brought many into danger, and for which lastly his own mother lost her Head.

(78) Then was he made Legate of Viterbia, where he determined to haue a more quiet life; but Pope Paul the third frowning the obtruded Council of Trent, appointed Paul with two others to be his Viceregents : Though indeed this Cardinal was none of the forwardest in the matter of justification, vnto whose opinion therein he drew one Marsell a learned Spaniard, who of purpose was sent to disperse the Popes Doctrine in that Counsell.

(79) But this Paul father lesning his Chaire empty by death, a faction fell among the Electors, some for the French, and some for the Emperour, which last light vpon Paul, & chooseth him for Pope. He altogether Imperiall, desired a more orderly election supposing himselfe to graces in the eyes of most that the same would be continued to his greater praise.

(80) But the French faction working vpon the aduantage, put the rest in minde of the Emperours lacking of Rome, the imprisonment and kill that were made of the Pope, the absence of many Cardinals Electors, whose voices they knew not, yea and Cardinal Caraffa, ailedged particular exception against Paul the elected, charging him (as Paul will likewise did) with incontinency of body, as also of Heresie, for arguing vpon a iustifying faith in the Council of Trent, for frequenting the company with Antonieus Flaminicus a knowne Protestant, and since he was Legate, that he neuer had punished that doctrine with death.

(81) But these accusations, were rather to shrow off his face top, that Caraffa himselfe might more eminently be seene, who thought if Paul failed, to be his fairest market; whereas his politike expectation was farre ouerseen. For the English Cardinals to cleared himselfe, that the French Caraffa retained disfigure, and all their voices went for Paul euen the same night, which he againe seemed to dislike of, saying, that his election should not be a worke of darkness, and therefore willed them orderly to proceed vpon the next day; his assurance had his hopes concerned, that hee thought dilinite had bene enforced to set the Papall Crowne vpon his Head.

(82) But whether it were his double delay, or his neglecting to strike when the yron was hot, the Electors change their determination, and chooseth the Cardinal of de Medici for Pope, who named himselfe Julius the third; and he to congratulate Paul for his Backwardnes, enforced Caraffa to ask him forgiveness before they departed the Conclave. Paul thus disappointed of the Papall Chaire, retired himselfe vnto Ferrara, where in a Monastery of S. Benetts (which order he had assumed and was the Paucis) he made his Residence, as desirous to leade a more contemplative life.

(83) But scarcely was he settled before he heard of King Edward's death, and a message sent from Queen Marie (who had bene brought vp vnder the Counsell of his Mother) for his returne into England. Her affection towards him, he knew was very great both for his person, his learning and religion, and himselfe relied much vpon the old familiarity betwixt them, as also of his birth being of the blood tomtill; for which cause hee for longed homeward, not doubting but if things stood as he thought, to get a dispensation, to lay off the Hair, and to put on a Crowne.

(84) But the Emperour mistrusting what this Prelate intended, found deuises to hold him beyond Seas, vntill the match was concluded betwixt Queen Marie and his Sonne. And hitherto Cardinal Paul applauded by the Pope, beganne now to enter into his browne, for being in England, and Archbishop of Canterbury: his old acule, the foretold Caraffa, had in the meane while obtained the Papsy vnder the name of Paul the fourth; when as presently he sent Frier Peto, whom hee consecrated Bishop of Sarum, and discharged Paul of his legatine power, which doings the Queen tookt to ill, that shee forbade Peto to enter the land, vnill a reconciliation was made betwixt the Pope and Cardinal Paul her hinfines. Which man as hath bene saide, for soliciting Potent Princes against King Henry, in the quarrell of Rome, had runne in great displeasure with the English, whereby some Acts of Parliament were made against him : all which were now repealed, and Lord Reinold Paul received as an Angell of God, vnto whom that honorable house presented a Petition, to bee received againe into the bosome of Rome.

(85) The suit easily granted, and absolution giuen, all things proceeded as the deuotion of the Romanists. Images were commanded to be erected againe in the Churches : Holy-water, Pax, and Censures, imploied in the Celebration of their Masses and Mattens : Oyle, Cense, and Spicery, vied in the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptisme. Altars furnished with Pictures, Colly Coverings, & the Crucifix thereon solemnly placed; vnto whom Lights, Candles, and Tapers, with great adoration were offered, and all to Captiuate the senses of the zealous Beholder, in which zeale Queen Marie her selfe gave a full testimoniall, in restoring againe all Ecclesiastical linings assumed to the Crowne, saying, that shee first sawe by the salutation of her owne soule, then first did by renue England : A worthy speech verily, and good example of a Prince, but slowly followed of many meane subjects, who in this case doe rather musle the mouth of the Owe, that treadeth out their Corne, then suffer such as serue at the Altar, to live by the Altar.

(86) And surely to well-inclined was Mary of her selfe, that had not the zeale of her religion, and the authority of Churchmen oerward her owne disposition, the flames of their consuming fires had not moaned to high. But woe to the procurer of those fire Atzicles, (for which many had died) enad by King Henry the eight, whole rigour in some sort himselfe had both qualified and repeated, which were againe put in practise, especially two, the one of them touching life, and the other losse of goods : which last was the separation of man and wife, the greatest offence to mutual society, and natural affection, as can be committed : & that of life tyrannically followed, as the Law it selfe may seeme with Draco's to be writ in blood, for within the compass of lesse then foure yeeres continuance, there died no lesse, for the testimoniall of their conscience in this case, then two hundred seauenty and fassen persons without regard of degree, sex, or age.

(87) In the heare of whose flames were consumed hue Bishops, one and twenty Dvines, eight Gentlemen, eighty foure Artificers, one hundred husbandmen seruants and labourers, twenty five wises, twenty widows, nine Virgins, two boyes, and two Infantes, one of them whipped to death by B. Banner, & the other springing out of his mothers wombe from the stake as fire burned, was by the Sergrantes throwne againe into the fire : Which barbarous cruelty, how fouler the Author of England three Conuersions, would excuse as worthy of death ; depraving the sufferers, of learning, religion, ciuill manners, and honesty of life ; yet the more charitable of his owne ranke, and protection doe picture the spilling of so much Christian blood, the greatest point of no greater sinne, then to beleue Caluins spiritual

(34) The rigour therefore that fell from his mouth, who with many more had so suffered, when the sword was so drawne, is faine from the precept and sufferance of Christ, that would have even casten raye vnplucks, till his harvest were in, and yea if thofe be his sheepe that follow his voyce, and his word fufficient to make the man of God perfect as himselfe, and Apollle hath taught, then were these excusable by their Adversaries testimonies, whose Procurator in a Conuocation assembled, publickly confessed that these delected Ministers had the word, but the Prelates in place the possession of the sword: which how they then made it drunke with the blood of Gods Saints, let him that hath the two edged sword in his mouth, at the great day of trial declare, to whose iudgement and mercie I leaue them.

(35) Sixty foure more were persecuted for their profession and faith, whereof seauen were whipped, sixteene perished in prison, and were buried in dunghills, many lay in captiuitie condemned, but were released, and saved by the happy entrance of peaceable Elizabeth and many fled the Land in those daies of distress, amongst whom most memorable is that of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke, with her husband Richard Barre Equire, whose Story and troubles happened as followeth.

(36) This Lady Katherine was the only daughter, and sole heire of Lord William Baron of Willoughby, and of Essex, and the last wife of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke lately deceased, in whose time how she affected the Papall Profession, in masking, and maskings, was made knowne by clothing a dogge in a Rocher, and calling him Gardiner, and againe, in the daies of King Edward, Gardiner saluting her from his prison window in the Tower, shee told him it was well with the Lambes now the wolfe was shut vp. These steeke fore vpon the Bishops stomacke, who being now risen to bee Lord Chancellor of England, and in the disgrace with the Queene for her match in marrying Master Barre a man too inferior for her high estate, he thought it a fitt time and occasion to requite, and to that end sent for Master Barre her husband, charging him to be indebted foure thousand pound to the Queene, which was owing her by his Ladies late husband the Duke of Suffolke, vnto whom shee was Executrix, but this was onely the wayne of a false fire, and the Dutchesse religion, the marke he asayed at, for whom Master Barre so wisely wrought, as himselfe was appointed to be her perfwader, and so inwardly grew with the Lord Chancellor, that by his meanes he obtained licence to trauell beyond Seas, for a debt owing to his Dutchesse by the Emperour.

(37) Barre being gone, and Lady Katherine secretly to follow, vpon the first of January with foure men, two women, and her young daughter, her selfe appparelled like a Merchants wife, from Lyons in London departed, the morning very milky, and her heart fraught with feare, for no sooner was shee gone, than owes therof came to the Court, and search made after her, as farr as to Leigh, before her Barke could attaine to the place: where being shrowded by a Marchant vnder the name of his daughter, shee escaped to Seas, but twice her shippe with conerary winde was driven to the same shoare, to her great danger and no little griefe: yet hilly, shee arrived in Brabant where shee met with her husband: whence (being clad like a freer) they came into Cleveland, and at Santen fenced themselves, till further promise could be made.

(38) But the Townsmen suspecting they were not the Persons they went for, and the Bishoppe of Arras hearing that they were Protestants, purposed with the Magistrate to impeach their liberties, which Barre bearing off, with his Freew and daughter, attended onely with two seruants suddenly made a way vnto Wesell, a Towne priuiledged with the Strildard in London. In trauell they were ouertaken by night, the weather was raie, and the thaw vpon a great frost, made the way more deepe, in which distress his two seruants be faine to seeke some reliefe, whilst himselfe (the surer on foot) bare the childe; and the Dutchesse to ease him carried his Rapier and Cloke.

(39) Thus passing thorow mire, dirt, and darke night, about tenen of the Clocke, all wet and wearie, they got vnto Wesell, where, hee being suspected to be a Launce-knight, and theer his woman no better then naught, could get no entertainment, the language they had noe, the childe cried pitifullie, the mother wept bitterly, the cold was extreme, and the raine poured downe as the cloudes had bene broken. In this distress the Church-porch was thought vpon to shrowd them from raine, and to that end Master Barre lent his two seruants to buye Coales and straw: but repairing towards this his cold Inne, he met with two boyes that vnderstood Latine, of whom hee demanded for the Ministers house, who presently brought him to the place, where hee supped. His name was Perisill and had bene in England, where, of the Dutches hee had receiued kind countreife, and now at Wesell plied his Ministry among certaine Wallas, who hearing that the Dutches was fled out of England, and that at Santen there liued nothing safe, had procured for their abode in Wesell, without making knowe who these English were saue onely vnto the chiefe Magistrate.

(40) Master Barre desiring to speake with the Minister, hee presently came downe, who seeing the Dutches disguised in apprel, and bemired in durt, could not speake vnto her for teares, and bringing them in with glad hearts no doubt, Master Barre changed apparell with the good man, the Dutchesse with his wife, and their childe, with the childe of the house: and thus they were comforted by this good Preachers meanes.

(41) Here they rested not long, but that a sudden watchword was sent them from Sir John Nassau, Queene Marias Ambassidor in Netherland, that the Lord Pager had faised an errand to the Spaw, and that the Duke of Branswick with tenne Ancients, would passe by Wesell for the seruice of Austricke, against the French King, by whom the Dutchesse and her husband should be intercepted and deliuered vnto the Lord Pager.

(42) From hence therfore in haste they removed to the Town Winchem in high Germany, which was seated in the Palgraves Dominions, where by his Protection they continued till their maintenance beganne soficant, and they also almost fainting vnder so heauy a burthen, began to faile of all hope. At which very instant (God so mouing the hearts of his Princes) the Palatine of Pinne, and the King of Pole hearing of their distress, sent them a safe conduct, vnder the Palatines seale with assurance of maintenance, if they would come vnto those parts.

(43) From Winchem therfore they forthwith departed, and in Wagon trooke towards Frankford, but by the Langraues Capitaine were intercepted and set vpon in the high way, so that Master Barre was forced to stand at defence, wherein the Captains Horse was slaine vnder him, and the cry maintained that he was slaine himselfe, whereupon Master Barre by the counsell of the Dutchesse, and swiftnesse of his horse fled againe, but was so expertly followed vpon opinion of murder, that hee hardly escaped with life, yet lastly they got into Poland, where they were honorably entertained vntill the death of Queene Mary, whose life in the meane while let vs returne to relate.

(44) The Nouember next following her marriage, the Queene was reported to haue bene conceiued with childe, for joy whereof Tre Draw was commanded solemnly to be sung, and Processions, and Prayers, made for her safe deliuerance. The Queene tooke Inomach that it passed in Parliament, that if God should take away Queene Marie, while their young Master coming into the world should find himself provided for where it was by Act ordained, that King Philip should be Protector of her life, and Governour of the Realmes, until their Prince or Princess should come to able yeeres.

All of them to be kept.

(97) Howbeit it should seeme this Spanish King had little confidence in the English, for at his first entrance, hee had the hall door of his Court continually kept shut, neither any suffered to enter, unless his business was first made known: the Lords having leave to depart London had their commandment to send all their harnesse and Artillerie to the Tower; which was done, in regard of the malignity of this marriage: yea and somewhat doubtfull hee was also of those, who in shew bare him a faire face; but given for that a Noble man in consultation, had rather his counsel to cut off Lady Elizabeth head, assuring himselfe, that those he had minded to their natural Princess, could not be better vnto him a stranger: who contrariwise vpon this ground so laid the foundation of his true honour, as it gained him love of all true English hearts: for from that day he neuer lost to sollicite his Queene for the delivery of that innocent Princess her sister, who still remained a solitary Prisoner in Woodstock, though no proofes could be brought for any offence.

(98) At last his faile was obtained, and Lady Elizabeth brought vnto Hampden Court, hauing not scene the Queene for two yeeres before, here there was lockt vp, and laid at by Gardiner to submit her selfe, till the night fourteenth dayes after, shee was sent for into the Queene's Chamber about tenne of the Clocke in the night: which she no sooner had entered, but falling vpon her knees, shee praised God to preserve her Soueraigne Maiesty: prostrating her loyalty and truth to her person, whatsoever had beene spoken or insinuated to the contrary. Vnto whom the Queene somewhat sharply said, then you will not confesse your offence, I see; but rather stand stoutly vpon your truth; I pray God your truth may so fall out; If not (quoth the Princess) I request neither favour nor pardon at your Maiesties hand: well, then said the Queene, you stand so stiffly vpon your own loyalty, be like you suppose to have beene wrongfully punished: it must not lay to your Maiesty said Lady Elizabeth: but you will then to report to others it seemeth, said Queene Mary: no, and it please your Maiesty slide the Lady, I haue borne, and must beare the burthen my selfe, I must humbly beleeue your Graces good opinion of me, and to thinke mee your true Subject, which from the beginning hitherto I haue ever beene, and will be for euer so long as my life lasteth. The Queene replying in Spanish, said, God knoweth, and so they departed; K. Philip as is thought standing behind the Armes heard what was said.

(99) Some seven dayes after, her Grace was discharged of Barnfield her laylor, and had lease of liberty, yet so, that Sir Thomas Pope a Priue Counsellor, and Mr. Gage the Queene's Gentleman Vicer, were still her Attendants all Queene Marie's time: her Gentlewoman Mistresse Ashley was sent to the Fleet, and three other waiting maides vnto the Tower; but the death of Gardiner immediately following, their stormes grew more calmer, and Lady Elizabeth euerie day more affectionate respected.

(100) About this time, William Cusly able, alias Fetherston, a Millers sonne in the North, bruted himselfe to be King Edward the first, but was seconded by none of any euer, and therefore the leste dangerous or likely to be beleued. Norwithstanding all diligent search was laid for the Counterfeiter; and hee lastly taken at Widham in Kent, from whence to Hampden Court hee was presently coueited, where his answers were so simple, that hee was executed as a frantick, and sent to the Marshall-See for a Lunaticke foole: and from thence in a Cart this counterfeiter King, whose Crowne was a paper inscribed with his faul) was brought vnto Windsor, and from thence whipp'd vnto Smithfield, whence hee was banished into the North, and without further punishment was so released: But this Elizabeth the next yeere (as a dogge returning to his vomit) gave it forth that K. Edward was alive, whereupon he was again apprehended, condemned of Treason, and hanged at Tyburn.

(101) Now the expected time of Queene Marie's deliverance being fully approached, a rumor ranne in London and elsewhere, that a Prince was borne for joy whereof the Bells were rung, the Bonfires flamed, Processions made, and some in their Sermons described the beauty of that goodly boy, and great Prince. At Antwerp also the like triumphes were made by the English Marchers, the Mariners shooting off their Ordnance; for which an hundred Pistolers were sent them from the Lady Regent; but these flying reports proved but wind, which turned the Sea shortly into another point, for the truth burthling forth, told for a certayne, that the Queene had neuer beene concieued, neither indeed was euer like to be: which raised as many doubts, as had bene tales of her deliverance: some affirming that shee was with Child, but miscarried, some, that shee was deuoted by a Tympany: and some that this rumor was spread for a policy: but what the truth was John Grafton, I referre vnto others that know more.

(102) King Philip thus frustrate of his hope for his Heire, vpon the fourth of September went ouer the Seas to visite his Father the Emperour, and to take possession of the Low-Countries, where hee stayed one yeere and six months, to the great griefe of Queene Mary his wife, whom as some thought hee little affected, and this his long stay made the suspicion no lesse. But now returning to Dauer, hee was by his Queene met on the way, and brought through London, accompanied with many Peeres of the Realmes, as in triumph against a Coronation.

(103) In whole absence many Conspiracies had bene intended, but their foggy smokes were vnto flame extinguished before the fire could burst into flame: for certaine persons plotting to robbe the Queene's Exchequer at Windsor, meant with this money to raise warre in the Land; the Leaders into this attempt were Henry Petham, Iohn Daniel, Richard Palk, Iohn Treuchemont, Iohn Desherie, William Stanton, William Roffey, Iohn Bradell and White, the reueler of the same inuendments. These all excepting White, were at sundry times executed, and Sir Anthonie Kingston apprehended for the same died on the way vnto London.

(104) The like flurries were attempted by one Clouer a Schoolemaster, sometime at Dysin Newfelde, who in the Parish Church of York, among a great assembly at the celebration of a marriage, stood vp, and read a penned, but traitorous proclamation against the Queene, perswading the people to take Armes, and to free the land of wrongs done by strangers.

(105) So likewise Thomas Stafford, second Sonne to the Lord Stafford, with other Conspirators against the King and Queene, fearing the iust punishments for their defaults, had fled the land into parts beyond the Seas; from whence attempting still to branch their Rebellions, they sent certaine bookes and letters written and printed, full of most slanderous vntruthes: and now following King Philip into England, assisted by some Kings and strangers, took by stealth the Castell of Scarborough in Yorkshire, where hee published a most shamefull proclama-marion against the Queene, traitorously affirming that there was neither rightfull, nor worthy of reign, and that the King had given vnto his Spaniards the greatest and strongest holds of the land. But by the prowess of Thomas Percy (presently created Earle of Northumberland) hee was surprised, sent to London, and there made shorter by the head. All these stirres quieted, new troubles were rather sought for then misliked, and more loffe followed to England dishonour, then glory had beene gained by this Spanish great March.

(106) For the Emperour over-worne with the affaires of the world, and wearied with the troubles of troubling wars, or rather rooched with remorse of conscience for the infinite miseries brought by him vpon Florence, Neples, Sicilie, Tuscane, Elbe, and Calabria, being perswaded that these mournfull iarrers of Christian Princes had giuen to the Turke advantage vpon diuers parts of Europe, hee called his sonne King Philip of England vnto Brussels (as is said) where, by authentick letters bearing date the five and twentieth of October, hee resigned all his Realmes vnto him, commanding all his estates and inheriits to acknowledge and hold him their lawfull King; and among many other instructions and most wise exhortations, gaue him charge chiefly to hold amity with the French, lest otherwise the warres of those Puissant Nations might oppress all Christendome.

(107) King Philip indeed was much inclined to peace, and Queene Mary his wife at that time much more, both to hold him with her at home, & to support the Religion which shee had raised, by restoring the Clergie their wonted possessions, whereof much was then held in the Noblemens lands, from whose hard-hold, hardly could any thing bee wrested; but those in her owne, shee freely resigned by Parliament, with this most Christian resolution, and princely saying: that shee felt more by the saluation of her owne Soule, then shee did by the renewing of ten Kingdomes, and so committed the re-stauration and dispose thereof vnto the Pope and Cardinal Paul his Legate, to the great wealth of the Church, and empowring of the Crowne.

(108) King Philip following his fathers aduise, made peace with France to continue for five yeeres, which no sooner was made, then was again broken, but most of all to the losse of the English: for the Kings did not loue, though their weapons were laid downe, and ancient hatred breed daily new discontent: one principall was misliked by Pope Paul the fourth, then an enemy vnto the Spaniards, whom Duke Alua had mured vp within the walls of Rome. His hope of helpe was in Henry the French King, vnto whom hee sent a triumphant batte, with a stately Sword, and therewith had success by the Guyse, who by force made his way open into Rome: But the French decreasing for want of pay, and the Spaniards still raising their Trophies of victory, the Pope thought it fittest to hold with the strongest, & so made frustrate his amity with the French.

(109) Queene Mary of England, now the Pope was for Spain, and Philip her husband preparing for France, to shew her great loue and obedience to both, rather sought an occasion against King Henry, then any misliked by him for the breach of peace. Her pretences were many, as that the French King had inflicted one Dudley and Astons, vnto a new conspiracy, which they conspired vpon in his Ambassadors house in London, and being revealed, fled into France, where they were maintained by an annuall pension. The like the alledged against King Henry for succouring of Stafford, and his rebellious complices, for suffering his Pyrats to molest her Seas, & for want of more, renewed the remembrances of Northumberland and Myrtes rebellions, who as was alledged, were supported by him.

(110) These things premised, a defiance was sent into France, and was pronounced vnto Henry at Rhemes by Clarenceaux King at Armes. The French King loth to heare of these warres made his answer and preparations accordingly: and Queene Mary contrary to promise, entreating her subiects with the quarrell of the Spaniards, with sound of Trumpet in London proclaimed warres against France. To prosecute which, King Philip her husband paid o-uer to Calles, and thence into Flanders, where hee made provision to enter the field: after whom the Queene sent a thousand horsemen, foure thousand footmen, and two thousand Pioners, and the Earle of Pembroke was appointed Captaine General, vnder whom in severall places Irued Viscount Montmarate, the L. Gery of Wilson, the Earle of Bedford, the Earle of Leicester, and the Earle of Warwick, the Lords Howard, De la Ware, Windsor, Tray, Shendely, and Dudley, with many other Knights of approved valiancy.

(111) These passing the Seas, joined with King Philip, which the Dukes of Savoy and Braunfuerth, the Earles of Essex, Horne, and Armsfield, had invaded the French confines, and planned a strong siege before Saint Quentin; to whose rescue Monsieur Montmarate Constable of France came with one hundred men at Armes, as many light horsemen, seven hundred Raisers, twenty two Ensignes of Lancequenets, and fifteen Ensignes of the French and thus furnished, hee meant to put more Souldiers into the Towne, but in the assay so miscarried, that himselfe was both hurt & taken prisoner with eight Noblemen more, all of them Knights of the Order, and not many dayes after, King Philip with his English came to the siege, by whose manly prowess Saint Quentin was taken, for ioy whereof great triumphes were made in England, which long lasted not, through the losse of Calles.

(112) For this great victory made the English both negligent and careless, so that the Towne of Calles, and the Forts thereabout for defence, were vnprovided and regarded, and besides the neglect of supply to those peeces, the Souldiers thinking all out of danger, Roodgazing at the shadow till the substance was lost: for the French being needed, that S. Quentin was Philip, let slippe no occasion wherein was advantage: and the Duke of Guis employing the Constable's place, determined to put in proofe an enterprise for Calles, which long and many times had beene purposed vpon.

(113) This danger fore-seene, intelligence thereof was sent into England, but no supply heard of, first the Master of the Ordinance poited to the Councell, and secondly followed the Captaine of the Castell himselfe, but either by wilfull negligence or lacke of credit with the Queene and Councell, those businesses in France were slenderly regarded, vntill the supply was altogether too late. For the Duke of Guis with a marvellous celerity approached the English Frontier, vnder a colour to visitall Bologna and Ard, and vpon a little fower plate of ground, intrenched at Sandgate, and thence diuiding his Army into two parties, sent the one vnto Essexbank, whilst the other laid battery to two Forts at once, both which hee wanne within the space of twelue howres, the Captaine and Souldiers secretly departing to Calles. The like success had the French against Essexbank, being abandoned by the English Souldiers, and left to the Guis and his dispo-

(114) Then were Canons mounted against Calles it selfe, and with continuall haillery for three dayes together, a breach made in the wall, not farre from the Water-gate, but yet vnassailable, the English within so maintained the defence: this then a traine of false fire (for the French neuer meant their access that way) whilst all attended to make good the breach, the Duke had planted fifteen double Canons against the Castell, which once perceived, the Callesians knowing their resistance to weake, fled red Barrels of Gun powder within the Keep, meaning to blow vp the French if they there entered, but that device failed; having waded through the ditch their clothes dropping wet, disabled the traine of powder to take fire, so that the French gotte the Castle with the death of Sir Anthony Ager Marshall of the Towne, his sonne and heire and foure score English besides.

(117) The Lord Wentworth then Deputie of the Towne seeing all in like danger if means were delayed, sent vnto the Castle to haue a Parlee for composition, which the French forthwith accepted, and sent out two Gentlemen for pledges whillett Iohn Hayfield Master of the Ordnance, and Edward Hall Constable of the Castle, concluded vpon these dishonourable Articles, as followeth:

1 That the Towne, the great Artillery, Victuals and munition should bee yielded freely to the French.

2 That the liues of all the inhabitants should bee saved, and haue their safe conduct to depart.

3 That the Lord Deputie with fifty others whom the Duke would appoint, should remaine prisoners and be put to their ransom.

(116) Things thus ordered, the English were commanded into the Churches of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas, where they remained that whole day, the night following, and vntill the next day in the afternoon, without either meate or drinke, in which time the Duke of Guise commanded by Proclamation that all Jewels, Plate and Money to the value of a groate should bee laid vpon the Altar, and that vpon paine of death, a sorrowfull offertory towards the English, and a great enrichment vnto the French. Thea was the Towne voided of five hundred ordinary Souldiers (a small Garrison indeed to man such a place) of Townsmen, women and children, foure thousand two hundred; the Lord Wentworth Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlain Captaine of Riohanche, Nicholas Alexander Captaine of Newnambridge, Edward Grimston, Iohn Rogers, and others, to the number of fifty were sent prisoners into France vntill ransom were paid: And thus the Town & Forts that were won by the victorious K. Edward the third, & that by no lesse then eleven months siege, hauing now bene possessed by the English the space of two hundred and eleven yeeres, was in the compas of eight daies besieged, surprized and wonne in the depth of Winter to the worlds wonder, and great suspicion of treachery, which happened the fourteenth day of January, and in the lame month were surrendered the strong forts of Guise, and Hames, where by all the English footing was lost in the Continent of France.

(117) This winning of Calis & the other strong holds as they were ioyous to the French, and with The Deame & Bonfires celebrated with no lesse solemnity, then was that for the recovery of the Countie Oye, & the fort won from the English in Dec. 1347. so was it greivous vnto the English Nobility, and most of al vnto Queene Marie her selfe. In so much as shee could not to trauell with the King and Councell how to counter the dishonour of her Raigne, by this losse of Calis; and albea some assaies were made against Brest, and Monsieur Thernes the new Captaine of Calis taken prisoner by Countie Egmont General for King Philip in the Low Countreys, yet the maine was neglected, and could not be recontered for any composition, which stroke to deepe a melancholy into Queene Maries minde, as shee letted not to lay, that the losse of Calis was written in her heart, and might therein bee read when her body should bee opened. In which passions she continued the rest of her Raigne, which neuer had bene very prosperous, nor greatly pleasurable vnto her selfe, after shee had abolished the Gospell, restored the Popes Supremacy, and married a stranger, who was vnto her a stranger indeede.

(118) Of al since the Conquest her Raigne was the shortest, only excepting that of Richard the Tyrant, but much more bloody then was his, and more blood spilt in that short time of her Raigne, then had bene shed for cause of Christianity, in any Kings time since Lucius the first establisher of the Gospell in this Realme. Her conception; failing, extreme dearths raging, hart done by thunders from heauen, and by fire in the royall Naue, forraigne losses, Calis surrendered, and King Philip keeping from Court, daily augmented Queene Maries melancholy, which laste increasing to a burning fever made an end of her life, at her Mannor of S. James neere Westminster, the 7. of Nonem. and yeere of Christis incarnation 1558. whil shee had reigned five yeeres foure months, & eleven daies, and liued forty two yeeres nine months and six daies, whose body lyeth interred in a Chappell in the Minster of Saint Peters at Westminster, without any monument or other remembrance.

HE Cloud thus set, that threatened more stormes, and a quiet calme happening when the rage was at highest, that withed Sonne then ascended our Horizon, whose rayes (as had beene hoped) presently dispelled all foggy Mist from Englands faire Skie; which was, the most milde Princesse Lady Elizabeth, another Debora, and nursing mother of Gods Sunne, who being then at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, was there first saluted Queene, and the same day, with great joy and full content of both the Houses of Parliament (at that time assembled) was solemnly proclaimed Queene of England, with all other Titles rightly belonging to that Imperiall Title.

(2) Shee entered her Government vpon Thursday the seauenteenth of November, the same day that her sister Queene Mary died, the yeere of Christs assuming our flesh, 1558. and of her own age, twenty foure yeeres, two moneths and ten dayes. Tower, and all complements prepared for her Coronation. In which time Proclamations came forth, forbidding any man to preach but by appointment, or to alter any Ceremonies, but according to the rite sin her owne Chappell, as also that the Litanies, the Epistles and Gospels should be read in all Churches in the English tongue.

(3) All things in a readines vpon the fourteenth of January, with great triumphes and sumptuous shewes, shee passed through London towards Westminster to receive the Imperiall Crowne; but before shee entered her Chapell in the Tower, acknowledging that the seat was Gods into which shee was to enter, and shee his Piercer to wield the English Scepter, in that royall assembly with eyes and hands cleaved to heauen vpon her knees, shee prayed for his assistance, as Salomon did for wisdom when hee tooke the like charge; (with a thankfull remembrance vnto God for his continued preferment, who had brought her through great dangers vnto that present dignity. In which triumphall State as shee passed through the streets of London, when the Booke of God was presented vnto her at the little Countess in Chape, shee received the same with both her hands, and kissing it, laid it to her breast saying, that the same had ever bene her chiefest delight, and should bee the rule by which shee meant to frame her government. And to testify her benign acceptance of the Lord Maior and Citizens approved loyes, she assured them that shee lacked no will, nor (as shee thought) power to bee to them as gracious a Prince as ever reigned in the Land, and that for the publicke good, if occasion were ministered shee would spend her dearest blood.

(4) The fifteenth of January (being Sunday) the Coronation was solemnly performed, and the Imperiall Crowne set on her head by Doctor Owen Oglethorpe Bishoppe of Carlisle, the Archiepiscopall See of Canterbury being vacante euer since her entrance by the death of Cardinal Pole, who died the same day that Queene Mary did.

(5) Presently there followed a Parliament, wherein the Title of Supremacy was againe restored to the Crowne, with the first fruits, and Tithes of all Ecclesiasticall living, and the Booke of Common Prayer ratified for a uniforme celebration of Gods diuine service in the English Churches, as also those Articles repealed, that were enacted by Queene Marie, in fauour of the Romish Religion. Things thus established, and liberty given to the Gospell, many that had fled the Realm in case of conscience, returned, and were provided for according to their worthes; and that Gods Truth might be established, (which thing her princely heart chiefly fought after) a conference was commanded and begunne at Windsor the last of March, concerning certain Articles to be discussed amongst the Diuities. The Propositions were three.

1 It is against the words of God, and custome of the ancient Church, to use a tongue unknowne to the people, in common Prayer, and the Administration of the Sacraments.

2 Every Church hath authority to appoint, take away, and change Ceremonies, and Ecclesiasticall rites, so the same be to edification.

3 It cannot be proved by the word of God, that there is in the Masse offered up a sacrifice propitiatory for the quicke and the dead.

The Impargners of these Affertions were,

The Bishop of Winchester, The Bishoppe of Lichfield, The Bishop of Cheshire,
The Bishoppe of Carlisle, The Bishoppe of Lancaster, D. Cole,
D. Harpsfield,
D. Longdall,
D. Cledyng.

The Defensors of those Affertions
were,

D. Scorie,
D. Case,
D. Sands,
M. Whitehead,
M. Grindall,
M. Harne,
M. Goff,
M. Elmer,
M. Ierrell.

These being solemnly met with many Honourable Counsellors among them, before the Conference could well beginne, it was finally ended, and all through the default of the Bishoppe (as Steu hath acknowledged) who, first pleaded a mistaking of their directions, and in the next sitting, vnto the others reasons, whereby all was vadone that was intended, and whereof a part was * Imprinted as is yet to bee seene.

(6) During the time of this Parliament a Petition was made vnto her Maiefty for the hope of roiall Issue, to moue her vnto marriage; vnto which eloquent Oration delivered by the Speaker, shee replied with great thanks for their louing care for her, and their owne Countrey: but as touching their request, shee answered, that from the time, when first shee considered her selfe to bee borne a seruitor of God, shee happily did chooseth, and in earnest belistked a Virginitie life, from which, neither Ambition of high marriages, which had been formerly offered her by her Prince, nor the grieuances sustained by her, whilst shee liued among those enemies, whose indignation was death, had hitherto bene able to diuert her: but whether her yeeres and answer could concord together in their iudicious minds; shee certainly knew not; yet this shee assured them, that as then shee stood so affected, and if that affection changed, her choiceth should be onely of such a one, as should bee as careful, shee would not say, as her selfe, (because shee knew her selfe best) but as any of them for the Realmes good, and yet wishall shee considered, that although her selfe, for their welfare (if neede were) would not shunne death, yet might her Issue, (as often happeneth to the best parents) grow out of kind, and prove vngenerous. And therefore to leaue behind her a more lasting and grateful remembrance, shee held it sufficient, that a Marble-stone should declare to posterities, that for a Queene shee had reigned, lived, and dyed a Virgine; and so with many thanks dismissed the assembly. How the first was accomplished, wee that liued vnder her reigne haue seene; but how insufficient that one stone is to containe, & continuall remembrance of her vertuous, pious, and glorious gouernment, the whole world doth at this day, and shall at all succeeding ages witness, whilst the Earth rests in the Center, and the Heaueins haue reliefe mouing.

(7) For the cause of Religion shee sent into Germany touching a league defensive, the Pope troubling the waters of that cleare fontaine, and disabliing her Title with the calumnie of illegitimation. In the meane while a peact being on foot betwixt the Kings of France and Spain, Queene Elizabeth also interposed for England, wherein the rebelling of Calles was a maine point, whereupon her Highnesse flood, which was thus.

(8) For the Earle of Arundell, the Bishoppe of Ely, and Doctor Watson Deane of Canterbury remaining Commissioners in France at the death of Queen Mary, vpon composition for the regaining of Calles, & other peeces lost in the cause of K. Philip; her Maiefty sent them instructions to continue their demands, and certain sure grounds whereon they might worke. The first was that the quarrell of war was not Englands, but Philips of Spaine, in whose fauour Queen Mary his wife against the will of her Council, leue him aid of her Subiects. French

Proffers that Cal-is was English.

French should challenge Calis as inhereditary vnto the Crowne of France, that they should auer, that there were many Signiorities and places in France, wherunto the English might make their iust claime, and some in possession since Calis was English, which Towne was not onely Lawfully granted, and assured from the French themselves vnto the Crowne of England, but was also allowed by Articles of all treaties of peace, for the space of two hundred yeares and more, this furthermore specially provided, that Calis should remaine in the quiet possession of the English.

Great Summes of Money owed by France.

And the better to impresse the deliuiery of Calis, in the mould of the French, they were to demand certain arrerages, whereto their King and Realme had fallen for great summes of monies and debts accruing to the English Crowne: as well by the acknowledgement of the mother of King Francis then being Regent of France, and iudgement thereupon giuen, as also by the treaty of Mers, de De, 1521. The treaty of perpetual peace, de De, 1527. and the late treaty between King Henry the eighth, and King Francis, for the deliuiery of Bullion, de de, 1546. by all which appeareth, that there was two Millions of Crownes due, and very little thereof yet paid, the copies of which treaties and confession, the said Commissioners haue with them. Also another debt of an hundred thousand crownes, as appeareth by a Bill of King Francis hand. And where also there is one perpetual pension of fiftie thousand crownes due, as appeareth by the treatie of perpetual peace, and one other pension of Salt, as appeareth by the same treatie. All which notwithstanding, rather then the French should recaine Calis, her maiesty was contented to remit the whole debt and arrerages: but without that in no wise she held it convenient to conclude peace with France, and that obtained, she remitted the other Articles to the discretion of the Commissioners. But the English Queene was no more desirous to haue Calis, then the French King was willing to let it goe. Whereupon laithly it was thus concluded, That Calis should remaine French, the terme of eight yeeres, and those expired, should returne to the English vpon forfeiture of five hundred thousand crownes; the branch of which agreement, from the Latine, and that from the originall, is thus translated.

(9) It is cōmēdēt, agreed, and concluded, that the said most noble Lady Queene of England, shall suffer and permit the said most Christian King of France, his heires and successors, to hold, possess, and peaceably enjoy, from the day of the date of this present treaty, vntill the terme of eight yeeres following, the Towne of Calis, with the appertinences and appendices belonging to the same, and also the port or haven of the said Towne, with the Tower of Ruyhaek, and also the Towers, Lordships, colleges, and places of Norwimberidge, Mers, Oye, Hams, Sandgate, the Tower and Towne of Goufou, and all the rest of that County taken in this last warre, and all other Townes, Castles, Villages, Landes, Dominions, Territories, Waters, Rivers, Hauens, Defences, Forts and Shores, and generally all places whatsoever situate vnto them by the sea, which the said most Christian King hath gotten in this last warre, and taken by force of Armes, in the raigne of the most noble Lady Mary, late Queene of England. And the said most Christian King, hath promised, and doth promise aforesaid in his owne name, as in the name of the King Dauphin his sonne, his heires, and successors, for which Dauphin, the said most Christian King hath made himselfe, and doth make himselfe answerable, promising that hee will take care of, and effect that the said King Dauphin shall approve this treaty, and ratifie it, within two moneths after the date of this treaty, which said terme of eight yeeres being complete and ended, the said most Christian King his heires and successors shall presently without delay, relinquish, deliver, and restore, or cause to be delivered, and restored to the said most noble Prince Elizabeth, Queene of England, her heires, and successors, or to those that should be thereunto deputed by her, or her heires and successors, the said Towne of Calis, with the appertinences and appendices aforesaid, and all other singular places aforesaid, and also the Towers, Castles, and fortresses whatsoever in the aforesaid parts, and also the places now of late divided, fortified, or reedified during the said terme of eight yeeres, and the said most Christian King his heires and successors shall leaue the possession of all the said places, and depart from it, and wholly forsake the same. So that the most noble Lady Queene Elizabeth, her heires and successors may peaceably enjoy, and quietly hold the possession of them, with all the rights, priuiledges, preeminences, superiourities, reuerences, and all other authorities in the like manner, state, condition and nature, in which the Kings of England haue held them, and possessed them before the beginning of this last warre. Provided notwithstanding, and expressly cōmēdēt, that the said most Christian King, his heires, and successors shall not be bound to restore or deliver the Townes and Fortresses, and places aforesaid, or otherwise then in the same state, manner, and condition, in which now at this present they are, and hereafter shall be strengthened and fortified by them, during the said terme, yet so notwithstanding as neither in the time of such restitution nor before, that there be not any thing done of set purpose, whereby the former state of the strongholds, and fortifications which now it is in, or which hereafter added by them, bee in any wise misused, broken, or otherwise, but that all things without fraude, bee restored inure and compared, in manner aforesaid.

As it is cōmēdēt and agreed that during the terme of the said eight yeeres, it shall neither be lawfull for the said Christian King, nor for the said most fortunate King and Queene of Scots, nor for the said most happy Queene of England to invade, attempt, or enterprize by warre any thing against each other, or for any one of them against the other, or against the Kingdome, proper dominions, and Subiects of each other, either directly or indirectly, to the prejudice of this present treaty, &c. And likewise if any shal shall bee so invaded and attempted by the said most Christian King, and most happy King and Queene of Scots, or the subiects of them, by the authority, commandement, and approbation of them, or any of them. Then the said most Christian King, and King Dauphin, their heires and successors, by such kinde of innovation attempted, vpon the dead shal be bound and obliged to leaue and depart from the possession and occupation of the said Towne of Calis, and of other places aforesaid on this side the sea, taken of late from the English, by the said most Christian King. And all those things they shall deliver and restore without any delay to the said most worthy Queene of England, in the same manner and forme, in which at the said terme of eight yeeres, they were promised and cōmēdēt to be restored: which restitution if it shall not be so made, the said Merchants and pledges shall be bound to pay the said penalty of five hundred thousand Crownes to the said most worthy Queene of England, and the covenant notwithstanding of restoring the said Towne Calis notwithstanding remaine in force. Moreover if any of the Subiects of any of the Princes aforesaid, of their owne authority, shall endeavour or attempt any thing against the subiects of either of the said Princes in prejudice of this Treaty, he shall be punished as an infringer of the peace, according to the quality of the fault.

These cōmēdēt notwithstanding they were failed and sworne vnto, yet were neuer performed at the yeeres of expiration, though Marchants were bound, and hostages assigned to remaine in England till the money were paid.

(9) So suspiciously had this Towne of Calis bene recovered from the English, that the Lord Westworth (the Deputie) was indicted in Queene Maries daies, and now arraigned at Westminster, the Marquess of Norhampton being his Iudge, and Lord Chiefe Steward of England for that day; but that Nobleman so nobly defended himselfe, that he was acquitted by his Peeres, and was a most honourable opinion for his many and faithfull seruices.

(10) Her Highnesse hauing thus decreed the English

English are from all Papall infection, and establishing Peace, the greatest benefit for the Subject; on the fourteenth of May, being Whitsunday, Queen's Service began to be celebrated in the English tongue, whereby Gods Trumpet might be heard in a perfect sound, and the prayers of the Congregation vnderstood with an understanding heart. To the end therefore that the Clergy, the Teachers of others, should not be infected themselves, the Oath of Supremacy, with other Articles, was offered unto them, the refusers whereof were forthwith deprived, and others furrogated that were more loially affected. In place of Pole deceased, Dodder Parker was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, and of York, Doctor Young in stead of Heth, who refused the Oath (and so of some others: then went forth Commissioners to suppress those Monasteries restored by Queen Mary, and to call out those Images set vp in Churches, whose sight hitherto heated the blinde zeale of many poore ignorant people in places of Oratory, were now themselves in the flames consumed in the fire, at whose flames might be said, as in Isaiah touching peeces of like huffe, had hence said: I am warme, I have beene at the fire.

(11) After the reducing of this purer worship into Gods Church, the next care the Good Queen tooke, was to enrich her Realme, by reducing her Coynees into fine and pure Sterling, and debasing of Copper monies: causing likewise great store of Manition, Armour and Powder to be brought into the Land, and laid vp in a readines as occasion should serue, that nothing might be wanting either for the wealth or safety of the Societie.

But the first hissed beginnings in England were little as it seemeth to the liking of the French King, Whose hope (saith Leſtie) by certain acts of Parliament made by Queen Mary against her sister the Lady Elizabeth to disbarre her from the succession of the Crowne, was to establish Queen Mary of Scotland, who had lately married Prince Dolphine her sonne, laying her title from Margaret the eldest daughter of King Henry the seventh, linked in Marriage with James the fourth King of that name, sister being the daughter of King James the fifth his sonne. And therefore as the neerest in blood, and lawfull heire to the Crowne of England, he caused by Proclamation in Paris his stile to be published under the name of Mary Queen of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and called the Armes of England, to be joined with Scotland and France, which the Dolphine and she did assume, both in their Steeles, Plate, Tafforie, and other adornments, which caused great troubles (saith here) betwixt the Kingdomes of England, France, and Scotland.

(13) In Scotland Religion (as England had embraced it) beganne to be practised; Preachers spake boldly, and booke were daily brought thither, which nothing as all commended the Pope, and by them (saith the Bishop) the people were moved to a sedition, which to prevent, the Queen Regent caused an assembly of the Bishops and Barons, unto whom the Ministers presented their Articles.

1 That their diuine prayer and publicke administration of the Sacraments should be in the English tongue.

2 That Bishops and other Ecclesiasticall benefices should be bestowed upon qualified men.

3 That such persons enjoying the profits, should performe their duties and preach the word to the people.

4 That none should be admitted in time to come, into the Ministry, untilt he life and learning were answerable to that excellent calling.

(14) To the two first, the Bishops alleging the customes of the Romane Church, would in no wise consent, leaving every man at liberty privately to pray in what language he best liked; and the election of their Bishops to the prescription of the Canon Law, and to the appointment of their Queene. For the two latter, they affirmed, no better order could be prescribed then that of their Common Law, which importeth vpon them, as much as was required; and thereupon they began to put the same in execution, commanding all that had charge of soules to fit themselves to their functions, otherwise to looke for no fauour from deprivation, after the terme of fixe months. Which was (saith the same Author) the principal cause, that a great number of young Abbots, Priors, Deacons, and beneficed men, did disp the cathe-dralize, and practised deuises for the ouerthrow of the Catholike Religion.

(15) True is, that at the preaching of John Knox, and other Ministers affecting reformation, not onely the Images, Altars, and other like things of abuite, were cut downe and burnt, but also the Charterhouse of the Priests at Perth destroyed, which was the fairest Abbey in the Realme of Scotland; then followed the ouerthrow of the Monasteries of Saint Andrewes, of Stone of Striding, and of Lindislaw; which ouerbearie proceedings caused such furies in the Land, that the Lords of the Conſtablement encamped at Cowper, to abide battle against the French (who came into Scotland to impach their purposes) had not the trauels of some Noblemen preuailed on either part.

(16) The French King, thus ouer-burſed about Scotland, was onceruleſſe of his own, when (at following the marriages of his daughter and sister) he would needs be a Challenger at tilt, seconded by the Duke of Guise & Ferrars, which triumphant toy, was suddenly clouded with a sad Catastrophe. For to runne his last (and indeed his last) course in fauour of his Queene, he sent a Lance to the Laie of Montgomery, with a command to haue him enter the tilt; but hee excusing himselfe from running against his Maieſtie, alleged, that fortune the day before, afforded him not to breake one ſtaffe, and that now (as he feared) the would put him to a second shamefully to the King, desirous to enforcing, and his date fully runne, least him a second command, which Montgomery very vnwillingly obeyed, and breaking his Lance vpon the Kings Cuirasse, a splinter thereof, his Beauer being somewhat open, shoke him so deepe in the eie, that thereupon shortly he ended his life.

(17) After whole death, Francis his sonne, and second of that name, at the age of sixteen yeres succeeded him in the Crowne of France; having by the marriage of Queen Mary, the Title of Scotland annexed to his others. He hearing of the troubles raised there, in case of Religion, sent Antoine de la Broche to gather the Field, and the Bishop of Amarans to assist the Queen Regent, with his farr reaching and inferring counsell. Sorely the preparation to withstand them was great, and the combinations many that stood for Reformation, as namely, one Duke, fourteen Earles, and cleuen Lords, besides other of name and account; but knowing their Adversities forces, and seeing those strangers to possesse diuers of their Townes and Forts, to the oppressing of the Kingdom vnder foraigne subditiō, they were enforced to become Petitioners vnto Queen Elizabeth, for aide to expell the French, who sought the Inboerſion of the Realme ſtate.

(18) The Magnanimous Queene, nothing fearing the threats of that potent Nation, nor liking such neighbours as formerly professed to rob her of her right, and now vnder pretence of suppressing the Sects, were not valiently to attempt an inuasion vpon her Realme; (for so the Admirall hired by the French were told they should doe) gaue them assistance vpon Articles assured; whereof one was, that they should hold faithfull concurrence with England during the life of the French King, and one yere after. For the performance whereof, sixe young Gentlemen were sent into England; and the Duke of Norfolke into the North, who from Barnie dispatched the Lord Gray of Wilton for Generall into Scotland, accompanied with many worthy Captaines, fixe thousand foot, and one thousand two hundred and fifty horsemen; therie comming to Salt-Preflon were were joyfully received of the Scottish Lords, who there in Council decreed what was to be done.

(19) From thence they marched toward Leith, where a Trumpet from the Queene Regent met them with a safe conduct for Sir James Croft, and for Sir George Howard, with five other Gentlemen to accompany them vnto her presence in the Castell of Edenburgh; vnto which the Generall and the Scottish Lords agreed, with an abstinence from Armes during the conference. But the French (the meane while) vnder the command of Monsieur Daisell assailed forth of Leith and in good array took the field, when the Lord Gray perceived, he sent an Harold vnto them, willing them to depart till the English were returned, according to the order betwixt their Regent and him; but they returned him answer, they were on their Mistresses ground, which they meant to make good, and therupon discharged a whole volley of shot vpon the English Army.

(20) The Allarum thus giuen when least it was expected, a cruel skitmilsh beganne, wherein died of the French about fiftie score persons, the rest were enforced backe into Leith, and many of the English both harte and flaine. Whereupon they entrenched the Crag, and planted their Ordnance against Leith, vpon whose Steepes the French had mounted their great Canons, whence their Bullets flew amaine; and ere long a bold attempt was undertaken by them, who with fiftie horsemen and five hundred Harquebusers issued out of Leith and assailed the English new trenches with such valour, as they entered, & a while possessed the same; where they tooke Maurice Berkeley prisoner, wonne his ensigne, droyd the touch-holes of three great peeces, and slew no small numbers of their reliuers.

(21) The English by this time had armed themselves (for this assault was vnespectedly giuen) and Captaine Paulsen with his, brauely entered the Trench, who being seconded by Captaine Jaumes, Beade, and Arthur Grey, recovered the same with some slaughter of men, the Ordinance from Leith discharging vpon them to the great annoyance of their honourable seruies; and now being Matters of what was late losse, they cleared the great Ordinance which the French had stopped, and cast a new Trench along by the old Chappell, whence with their great Peeces they beat downe the Steepes of Saint Anthony and Saint Nicholas in Leith, and dismounted the Peeces that therein lay leuelled against them.

(22) In the full course of which dissensions, the Queene mother, Regent of Scotland (a Lady of excellent endowments of minde) consumed with thoughts, displeasures and Melancholy, departed this life in Edenburgh Castell: the Lords waxing stronger, and Leith much weaker through extremity of famine, and the French King, (the onely pillar on whom their strength did consist) not able to assist them. Who being brought daily into leares through new tumults arising, and Increased in his owne Countrey of Ambush, was forced (alth Leith) to yeeld vp all the Dominions, both of France, and of Scotland, vnto Pope Pius the fourth, to bee at his command and defence; but his Holinesse fearing his owne tottering estate, like a wife man, that meant to warpe no more then he could well weare, suffered king Francis to seek for other redresse, which hee did from her, that was more willing and better able to giue him content.

(23) For sending his Ambassadors vnto Queene Elizabeth, whose noble spirit himselfe had first provoked, desired her peace to bee had with Scotland, & that Commissioners might be appointed to meet with his in that Resime; alledging that it was violating to a Soueraigne to sue to his Subjects, as hee was ouer them by his marriage with their onely Queene. Her princely mind caer forward to assist the afflicted, and now desirous to see Christian blood, dispatched into Scotland, Sir William Cecil her Principall Secretary, with Doctor Watson Deane of Canterbury, one of her sacred Councell, eminent for his singular prudence, and formerly employed vpon like affaires in France.

(24) These falling in conference concluded finally vpon certaine Articles, whereof those that concerned England were these: That neither the King of France nor his Queene of Scotland, should thenceforth vie the Armes or titles of England or Ireland, and that all letters sealed with those Armes should bee called in within five monethes space: that both the English and French should depart Scotland, some few excepted, employed vpon occasions, and that a generall pardon should bee enacted by Parliament concerning all such as had bene in these sturres. Which Parliament was assembled at Edenburgh in August following. These things accomplished, an Ambassage of thanks was solemnly addressed vnto Queene Elizabeth by the Earles of Arundell, Glenwarne, and the young Laird of Leinsington, with profert that the Earle of Arundell, the greatest Lord in account among them, should be at her disposal for marriage, which (as they well hoped) would be to her selfe.

(25) With the like conceined hope the yeere before, John Duke of Finland, second sonne to Gustab King of Sweden, was sent to her by his father, to treat a marriage for his elder brother Eric, who was most honourably entertained, but dismissed without all hope of his suite. Notwithstanding, Gustab being dead, Eric now reigning King of Sweden, hauing imprisoned his brother Johan, solicited her Maiesty the second time, but to his dishonour as it fell out, for his suite reected in the English Court, hee attempted to match with the yongest daughter of Philip Laurance of Spain, who hearing that hee had twice received deniell in England, desired him also with some disgrace, giuing his daughter vnto Adolf Duke of Holf, vnto vnto Fredricke King of Denmarke, at that time enemy to Eric.

(26) The Peace scarcely was concluded betwixt England and France, when Francis the young King was taken away by death, and another popill King crowned, even Charles his younger brother, and ninth of that name, who was guided altogether by the Regency of the Queene mother, and molested with the ciuill dissensions betwixt those Princes of Guise and Cande. For whose reconciliation Queene Elizabeth sent Sir Henry Sidney Lord President of Wales, vnto which her endeauours, howbeit the French gave countenance in Court, yet on the Seas they tooke her Merchants shipper, imprisoned the men, and seized their goods, no other cause alleged but that they were Hugonots.

(27) These misdeameors, England's great Queen tooke not well; yet did shee not so much blame, as pitty the young and overruled King, brought to such a straight, that hee was neither able to defend the authority of his owne lawes, nor to vphold the leagues made with other Princes. But most especially the cause of Religion (the onely pretended moitie of all these disturbances) together with the sollicitations of the French themselves (as from Raan, Drep and Newbaun) moued her Maiesty first to let forth her greiuances publicly in print, and next to lend aide vnto Monsieur Villars Captaine of Newbaun against such as sought to subuert both religion and the Estate.

(28) These landing in Normandy were with great ioy receined into the Townes of Newbaun, Raan, and Drep, which were willingly surrendered into the English Queenes possession (the onely Cloud-pillar that hood betwixt Gods chosen Israel, & the blood-seeking Amalekites in this wilderness of Spain) with this reuerberation by the Queene her selfe inferred, as way to preiudice the Kings Sueraigne authority, nor the estate of the Realme, for vpright was the, notwithstanding their late vnuilt intruding vpon her right and title.

titles and her own estate and ancient title to those foraine parts, and especially to Normandy.

(29) The General of these English is sent, was the Lord Amherst Dudley Earle of Warwick, who following his charge before gone to Seas, arrived at Newhaven the nine and twentieth of October, where his Commission was proclaimed, and oath taken, vnto whom strengths of Scottish men were sent him from Dunee, whereof Monsieur Montgomery was presently made Governour, having John Reau vnto the King of Norwarr, though the vnfortunate King bought the victory with his owne death, as he viewed the weaker parts of the City.

(30) To withstand the English then seded in Normandy, the Conte Engrenay was sent, and in familiar conference told the Earle of Warwick, that he was come to bee his neighbour, but proved indeed to conuince an encroacher, as lastly he dispossessed the Earle of the Towne. For albeit that many manly feates were therein performed by the English, and the place stored with prizes of wines, yet wanting fresh victuall, but especially fresh water, which the enemy had cut off, the calamities were great, and much more augmented by a contagious pestilence that slew many more the did either famine or sword, so that the English having posselt the Towne for eleven moneths space, now were constrained to surrender it vpon compulsion, bringing thence many sicke soldiers that dangerously infected England with a long continuing plague.

(31) Times motion in England now moued only with the benefite of peace, and no act memorable to commit vnto history; let vs supply this Interim with looking a little into the state of Religion in France, as wee haue scene, and somewhat touched the proceedings thereof both in England and Scotland. The Gospell spreading farre in that faire Continent, the impugnors tooke occasions to raise many flrites, and all in these to race out new heresies, as they accused & called the reformed doctrine. For which cause the French Townes burning in the flames of seditions, the Protestants blood was thought fitt to quench them, & the rapines committed vpon chaste virgins, was pretended to be canceled by a marriage wrought and contracted betwixt two Princes of the blood: which were Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Norwarr, a fauourer of the Gospell, and Margaret of Valois the third daughter of King Henry the second, and sister vnto King Charles now reigning, a Princesse much devoted to the Romish Religion. These must bee the Birds to bring others to the Net, and one of them laid for, to bee caught in the same laire.

(32) This match was plotted by the Marshall of Coffe, and the Chaple of Requey, with the deuile no doubt of some in higher place, who wrought the Queene of Norwarr, vnder the pretence of great affection, that the French King bare vnto her, and the Chastillain Admirall (a most zealous Protestaut) vnder an intent of employment for the defence of the Low Countries, against the King of Spain. This match indeed seemed to confirme a publike concord, only the Popes disposition must bee had by reason of pretended conlinguinity of the parties, the one being petty Nephew, the other grand-child of Francis the first King of France. And the Queene of Norwarr made some scruple of the Ceremonies for the celebration, place and Church: but ciuill reason owerwaying all difficulties, the Theater must be Paris, as the Capitall City, and the marriage acted without any change of Ceremony, or of royall forme.

(33) Chastillain the Admirall was formost at Court, where the Papales gaue him place, and to take from him all ieaousie or mistrust, the King countenanced him so much, that he repayed his losses sustained in the warre, grants him the reuenues of his brother the Cardinall Chastillain, that lately fled and dyed in England, creates with him familiarly, giues him a place in his Priuy Councell, and euer honours him with the plausible name of Father; inso much as the people beganne to murmur that King Charles not only fauoured the Huguenots, but was now become a Huguenot himselfe. And the Admirall for his part thinking all vpright, so that end moueth the King to treat a peace with the Queene of England to the preiudice of the Spaniards: with these motives among others that Elizabeth was vnmarrried, and Henry Duke of Annon had no wife, the dignity of so high an alliance was honourable for the Duke, and the quality of a Kings brother was not to be condemned by the Queene, he having in his yong yeeres purchased great honour and reputation.

(34) The charge of this meslage was committed to Marshall Montgomery, both to haue his absence at Court, the better to worke what was intended, & to stay her Maicesty by vertue of that peace, from attempting any thing against France, in fauour of the Protestants. The foord thus founded by the well menning Admirall, seemed the more safely passable: for the two Queenes of England and Norwarr; the first of them granting the Peace so desired, and the other without all ieaousie repaiored to the French Court; where eighteen dayes after her arriual, a quotidian feuer freed die, though others laide not without suspicion of poyson by the perfume of a paire of Gloues presented vnto her.

(35) Soone after, the marriage was solemnized vpon a high Scaffold, built before the Church dore of our Lady in Paris, and foure dayes spent in plaies, feasts, dancing and Maskes: all which were but traines and introductions vnto what was intended: for the Admirall departing the Kings presence with all complements of amity, as hee passed from the Loure, and in reading a Petition, was with a Harquebussie leuelled out of a widow, shot into the left arme, and dangerously hurt. At which traitorous attempt the King and Queene-mother seemed to bee greatly perplexed, wishing him with all expedition, and for his further safety commanded all his fauourers (the Protestants) to bee lodged, nere about him. But the night now approached, Casseres brake into his Base-Court, and three of his Company entering his Bed-chamber, with their weapons barbarously murdered him, whose goared body at Guises command, they cast out of the Window, Guise himselfe wiping the blood from his face, acknowledged him to be the man. His head they cut off, and presented to the Queene-mother, and shee bawling it, sent it to her Holy Father for an assurance of the death of his most capital enemy.

(36) The Pallace Clocke strikes (the Watchword vnto the Alarm) when the other armed troupes flee to the Admiralls lodging, cut off his hands, dragge his martyred Carcase through the streets, and lastly hang it vpon the feet at Montfaucon. And with the like hellish fury the bloody faction oppressed the Protestants, both in the City & Suburbes, sparing neither sexe, condition, nor age through whole streets nothing was heard but pailly horron, armes, howles and death, with the pitifull thinkings of the Innocents, crying (but alas in vain) for mercy. On the other side, the shoates of the murderers preuailed, saying, that this one day should end the quarrell, which neither penne, paper, decrees of Iustice, nor open warre for twelve yeeres together could end doe. Lamentable was the spectacle of those sacred and massacred carcases strewed in the streets, the puyments, market-places and riuers dyed with their blood, and that Saboth made direfull, and to the Papists insatiable, with the bloody pollution of ten thousand Innocents, in the staine whereof we will leaue them, and returne out stile againe for England.

(37) As these ciuill seditions were on foot in other parts, so Ireland too too rebellious, sought vnder the shelter of Shan O Neale, to throwe themselves from the obedience of Queene Elizabethes government.

(1) John O. Neale

ment; a man cruell by nature, and claiming an inheritance right of the Province of Yfler, as the O-Neale formerly had done of all Ireland. For in the troublesome times of Robert Brur, when his brother Edmund named him self King of Ireland, Donald O-Neale, rowled out of his lurking holes, in his mislike letters vnto the Pope, stileth him self King of Yfler, and in right of inheritance the vndoubted heire of all Ireland. But his glorious shew being clouded before it was scene, his posterity pild in their homes like snailles, vntill the firebrandes of Ciuill dissensions betwixt the Houses of Lancaster and Torker, gave light to their footing, whillett the English left Yfler vnto their custody, and followed in England the faction which they best fauoured.

(38) At which time, Henrie O-Neale, began to be great by marrying the daughter of Thomas Earle of Kildare; as afterward also his sonne * Cam-O-Neale, married the daughter of Girald Kildare (his mothers brother) both of those Kildares being Deputies of Ireland. From the bed of these Catholickes, issued Cam O-Neale, surnamed Races, because he halited; who was so right Drift, that hee curled all his posterity, in case they either learned the English language, sowed wheate, or built their houses, leatt the first should breed conuersionists, the second Commerce of sustenance, and with the last they should speeche as the Cowse that buildeth her nekk to be beaten out by the Hawke.

(39) But King Henry the eight, with whom was no dallying, seeing his tallant salt on Kildare, in whose rebellions O-Neale had engaged him self deepe, so ouer-dares this enuying Irish bird, that hee flies into England, sues to the Eagle, reconneeth the name of O-Neale, and puts his whole estate into the Kings hand. Whose humble fobmission so satisfied this crowned bird, that his life was delivered out of his claw and letters Patentes granted vnder the Great Seale of England, to hold his teenewes in Fee of the King, together with the Title of Earle of Tir-Owe, to him and to Mathew his false repared son, and to the heires of their bodies lawfully begotten, at what time the said Mathew was created Baron of Dungannon.

(40) Shan O-Neale (with whom wee began) the eldest legitimate vnto this Cam-Races, seeing him selfe disherited, and a bastard preferred before him, suddenly set his heart against his father, as also against Mathew his high honoured and half-reputed brother, whom he neuer left till hee had murdered, and pursued his father with such irreconcilable hatred, as he stript him out of house and all, and neuer left, till for want and griefe, the olde man pined away.

(41) Shan then chosen proclaimed, and inaugurated O-Neale, by an old shoe cast ouer his head, leized vpon his fathers inheritance, and with all diligence sought after the sonnes of Mathew, to secure him selfe of that which he had got. Brian the eldest he caused to be slaine by Mac Donnell Tutan, one of the Oweale race, but Hugh and Cormack by means of the English escaped his hands. Thiblicated in Yfler he beganne to tyrannize ouer the great men of that prouince, accounting them his Subiects, as in his answeres vnto the English Iustices, expostulating with him vpon that point, he laid his Title.

(42) That hee was the vndoubted sonne and heire of Cam-Oweale, borne of his lawfull wife; and that Mathew his suppoled brother, was the sonne of a Blacke-Smith borne in Dundalke, and vnto the age of fifteene yeeres had bene so repared and taken; that then hee was obtruded vpon Cam, by the said Smiths wife, whom hee had formerly kept for his Concubine, with an intent to interuene the inheritance and honour of the O-Neale another way. That his surrender vnto King Henry of England, was of no validity, considering that Cam had no longer therein than his owne life, neither could that lawfully be done without the consent of the Nobles of Yfler, by whom he had bene elected O-Neale. That him selfe was by Law both of God and man, the onely true heire, being the first begotten sonne of his father, lawfully borne in Wedlocke, chosen, delected and proclaimed O-Neale, by the generall content of the Peeres and People of Yfler, and that according to the ancient law Tamillyr, whereby a man at his full yeeres is to be preferred before a boy, and an vnle before a nephew, whose Grandfather suruived the father, and lastly, that hee had done nothing, but what he had sufficient authority to doe, and winch his ancestors had not vied before him to doe.

(43) His stile thus pleaded and passed without opposition, he presently fell into other outrages; for O-Rayle he ouerthrew in the Field, tooke Cathagh O-Daniel Lord of Tir-Conel captiue, call him and his children in prison, carried away his wife, and in adultery begat bastards vpon her, leizing vpon lands and goods at his pleasure, and bare him selfe as absolute King of Yfler.

(44) These his doings Thomas Earle of Suffex (the Lord Deputie) sought to redresse, whose preparations so strangely terrified him, that by the counsell of Girald Earle of Kildare, hee came into England, and callt him selfe prostrate at Queene Elizabeths feet, and vpon his submissiue behauiour and promised allegiance, with her gracious fauour returned home; where for a while in his diet and apparell, hee comforted him selfe to all kind of ciuility, yea and did some office of seruice in driving the Sents out of Yfler, slaying their leader Mac-Consel, and in protecting the poorer sort from the violence and oppressions of the Nobles. In which his doings he drew vpon him selfe their hatreds and complaines, and he whose nature could digest neither, fell furious for reuenge vpon Mac-Gair, Lord of Fermagh, freed Armagh the Metropolitane City, laid siege vnto Dundalke, and harted the Country on eury side.

(45) Against whom Sir Horre Sidney, then Deputy of Ireland, came in person him selfe into the Field; and Edward Randolph, a renowned Coronell, with leuen Ensignes of Foot, and a Comet of Horsemen, encamped at Derry by Lagh Foul, that so hee might charge the backe of the Rebell; which O-Neale well perceiving, halted with his forces to remoue: where Randolph in a pitch field entered battle, and there manfully fighting with honour, lost his life, but gaue the O-Neale so great an ouerthrow, as neuer after hee was able to make Head against his Soeraign, and in many other Skirmishes was so foiled, as hee euidently saw his owne dreadfull downfall. Wherefore he minded once more to sue for the Queens mercy, and with a halter about his necke, intended to humble him selfe to the Lord Deputy, for his fauour and mediation vnto her Maiesty.

(46) But making Neale Mackeuer (his Secretary) secret to these his delignes, was by him counselled to try fortunes fauour yet another way: the occasion well fitting, and the persons of great hope (if hee could fasten amity with them) which were the Sents, who held their standing Summer-Campe in Clanchy, vnder the conduct of two Brethren, Alexander Oge, and Mac Gillaspie, whose father and brother these Shan O-Neale had lately slaine, in an ouerthrow giuen to the Sents. For the surer gaining of whole fauour, hee sent before hand Surlay-brer, Alexanders brother, whom hee had taken and retained prisoner a long time, and sooner asked him selfe with the wife of O-Daniel (whom adulterously hee kept) repairing vnto them was kindly welcomed and intertained in a Tent; where after their Caps, they fell to a brawle about James Mac-Consell (Alexanders brother) whom Shan had slaine, as also about the honesty of his sister, whom hee had married and cast off, for the looe hee bare vnto O-Daniels wife. Whereupon after a signal giuen, in hate of reuenge, Alexander and his brother with many wounds hacked Shan O-Neale to death, a few of his followers escaping their swords by flight, by whose death Yfler recovered their wished peace,

Callis demanded of the French King.
April 28. 1567.

(47) The time now expired for retention of Calis (soe thirled after, and so thirthingly kept; Queene Elizabeth presently first vnto Charles the French King, to demand the deliuey according to covenantes. He let in estate, accompanied with the Queene mother and others, the English Embassadors had audience, and the Title contoured among them as followeth. The Queene Letters read and attendancie given what would more be said: Sir Thomas Smith (for he was the man) demanded in her Maiesties name, the Towne of Calis, the Forts, and other the appurtenances, the Castle and Towne of Genes, and generally all such Castles, Townes, and places as had bene taken by his Father Henry, the late French King in his late warres, from Marie late Queene of England, her Maiesties sister: which in a Treatie of peace made at Castellon in Cathol the yere of Christ, 1559. was agreed vpon, that his Soueraign, Queene Elizabeth should permit the said French King and his successors to possesse, and peaceably to enioy the said Townes, Castles, and places, the space of 8. yeeres, and thole expired the said K. Henry covenanted for himselfe and Successors to deliuer the same ingirely vnto the English, which being compleat and ended the second of that present month 4 April, himselfe with Sir Henry Norris her Maiesties Ambassadors vpon the third day of the same month demanded in her name the possession thereof accordingly, but could not attaine or get speech, either with Lieutenant or Gouverneur. Whereupon they were inforce to make preface to her maiesty, whom hee doubted not but would accomplish the performance, and likewise keepe perpetual amity with his Soueraigne Lady and Mistresse.

The Towne Governours would not be spoken with.

Objections against the Q. of England.

(48) King Charles but young and altogether gouerned by the Queene mother, hauing well learned his lesson, made present answer, That Callis was his, and that none had right thereto but himselfe, neither should any deliuer it to any other, and that the Treaty, named by the English Ambassadors, did wholly eue it from. Whereunto Sir Thomas replied, That neither her Maiesty nor Counsell did so take it, nor indeed could, the words of the Treaty being so plaine and manifest. Why, says Smith, quoth the Queene mother, I marvel the Queene your Mistresse would not send for such a purpose, and especially you, who knoweth more better, how all things have passed: you know that your Queene hath forfeited Calis, and all her rights in these places diuorced. As for by invading the Kings Subiects in Scotland, then most manifestly at New-burgh, where the King, my sonne, was faine with an whole Army to recover it, and in the said Treaty was an Article as hath bene disputed; that if the Queene of England should invade any part of my sonnes Dominions, she should forthwith lose her right in Calis.

Answers to
objections.

(49) Madame, said Sir Thomas, said King Henry and his successors were bound to lose Calis, if they invaded England, and yet did King Francis brother to the King here, doe it by the way of Scotland, as is most manifest, after the said Treaty at Castellon, and not in assuming the Armes and Title of England and Ireland, but contrary to the Article of Peace, which concluded that both English and French should depart Scotland: which incontinently her Maiesty performed, in rucking thence her Lieutenant, Captaine, and Souldiers: whereas contrariwise Monsieur d'Avall their Chiefeaine abode therein still, and the French power daily augmented vnder the conduct of Monsieur de Martignie, and de la Brulle, and also by an other great Commander, whose Naue was disperbed by tempest, and whose strength his shipwracke did testifie, in Holland, Zealand, Norway and Denmark, by the losse of Armour, Men and Munition: to let passe Britaigne and Normandy, then in preparing to invade England; and Landenburgh likewise hired in Saxony, and the Land of Lauenburgh to assist the French in that enterprise, when these Almanes according to their nature loth to take Seas, and desirous to know whether their service intended, were told, they should no further then Scotland, and to the Land adjoining, which was plentiful of gold, silver, and all kind of wealth, and where no Almanes Souldier had made spoile for the space of an hundred yeeres before, and to some of them in plain termes it was told, that they should into England; which was likewise signified vnto her Maiesty, both from her neightbour Princes, warning her highnesse to take good heed vnto her selfe; as also by letters intercepted, that declared their intents; whereof shee did not onely admonish Monsieur de Seure then Ambassador in England for France, but also by her Ambassador to the French King, praying him to delist from such attempts so preiudicial to her Highnesse, and so directly against the treaty of Peace. To colour which matter the said de Seure made a Protestation in print, the answer whereunto is likewise printed in English, French, Italian, and Latine, wherein may appeare the History of that time. And since her Maiesty hath had a more manifest prooue by men which are yet alive. For when the most part of the French power was arrived in Scotland, the Queene Mother, Monsieur de Oseill, and Monsieur de Martignie called the Scottish Lords with their Forces vnto Almouch besides Burwick; where they declared that their minde was to invade England, and to give to the King and Queene the possession of the English Crowne; of which they now had the Titles and Armes. But the Lords of Scotland vpon consultation, made answer, That they had often attempted to invade England, but they neuer got any good thereby; further affirming, it was against the peace newly concluded and sworn: so neuer was it to execution. Vpon this there followed a treaty of peace at Edinburgh, wherein the numbers of French Souldiers were to be lessened, the Title and Armes of England left downe, and the treaty of Castellon renewed and confirmed: all which may appeare by the hands of them which were Commissioners, authorized by the French King vnder his Great Seale: which treaty when it was signed with all the Commissioners hands, the Queene my Soueraigne for the lone of peace being contented to feile and sweare, the said King Francis did refuse the both, still refusall her Maiesty doth, and hath alwaies taken that the right of Calis both propriety and possession was deuolued vnto her by reason of the attempt, and hath demanded it diuers times, yet was content to stay the time of composition; which now being clearly expired, it must needs bee hers, and cannot iustly be denied.

The French charged with hard dealings.

The Scottish Lords now will to be led by the French.

The French King refused to looke on the peace.

(50) Why (said the Queene) all this while you have said nothing against the King my sonne, why he should forswear it, hee hath done nothing, and in the bearing of your Armes to great matter with you; yea heere the Arms and stile of ours, and so many, beere others Armes also, NoMadam said Sir Thomas Smith the bearing of the Armes is not so great a matter, but that with other things doe declare the intent, and the attempt maketh the right forfeited by the treaty. And though the King your sonne did not forswear it, yet the right being once lost from France, and accrewed to the Queene of England, how should it goe from her againe? All this while (said the Queene Mother) you speake but of the King of Scotland, who did it in his wares right, and there you must aske your amends, and not here, you heare what my sonne saith, and every man feele the right to his, your Queene hath forfeited it, and therefore I marvel my good will shal find it in, or send to demand it. This is the answer said Sir Thomas which I had carry to the Queene my Soueraigne. That? Nay, said the King, I will talk with my Councils, and then shall you haue a resolute answer. Then were the English Ambassadors desired to absent themselves a while, and within an houre after were sent for againe.

* Ambassadors taken care of a former treatise written by Sir Thomas Smith.

The cause for this declared before the French King and his Council.

(51) The King for in Council with the Queen Mother, the Dukes of Anjou, Alençon, Montpensier, Anjou, and Navarre, the Cardinals of Bourbon and Chastillon, the Bishops of Orleans and Lincennes, Monsieur de Valence and others, the Ambassadors of England were placed in the middle: unto whom the Queen spoke and said, Monsieur L'Ambassadeur I pray you say your mind before the King and his Council here assembled: which Sir Thomas Smith presently did in the same forme as hee had done before, adding with all, that this demand was grounded upon the lapse of the time, by which without ill controuersie after eight yeeres Calis was due to the Queen of England, and then by right, both the propriety, and the possession thereof was inuoyed unto her long ago, by the forfeiture made by the attempt in Scotland, by the commandement and consent of France the legat to invade England, seeing the King did not ratifie the treacie made at Edinburgh.

Calis forfeited by Cousin.

Monsieur de Valence.

(52) Monsieur de Valence said the Queen Mother, I pray you answer that, when can be standing up, Calis, my selfe was sent to that treaty of peace, and am glad to hear Monsieur L'Ambassadeur confesse that the bearing of the English Armies was but a small matter, yet was that the chiefest thing impayed by their side, as for the means of warre, they were not above five thousand at the most, sent indeed because of a rebellion (for so much I term it in plain termes) they resist there. But the English men were about fifteen thousand that came against them at Peter-Lith. There was sent thither also the Bishops of Amiens with the Pope's Bull, to reduce them againe to the Religious Romanes. And as touching these matters I spoke with your Queen as I came thither England, and offered her as much as at the first as was done in that Treaty, if she would break the League betwixt her and the Scottish Lords, which were Rebels. But since she could not. Now for the ratification and confirmation of that Treaty which was signed with my hand and others: there should haue come into France certain Scottish Lords to haue agreed and subscribed certain Articles, which did deferre to come till the King was more sick, and could not attend them, who shortly after died, and so the Treaty was not ratified. And being dead the King that now is, had nothing to do to ratify it for the matters therein touched Scotland, and their Queens dowry and sister, which appertained nothing at all unto him.

Sir Tho. Smith.

(53) To whom Sir Thomas replied and said, I am not ignorant that the Article last, Armies inuoyed, attentant moiri, and doe not take Arms to signifie Armies. But the Arms that I meant to weigh the most, and the attempt with them done was the Armed men, and the good Captain whom I named D'Oysel, Basse, Marignac, and others, their Engines and Companies, marry the Armies and Troops did disclose the intent and meaning. And if there had bene none other but them which the Bishop brought, and none other munition but the Pope's Bull; Queen Elizabeth should not haue needed to haue armed so many ships, nor sent so many soldiers to haue let their enterprise, nor would euer haue complained of it: but it was farre otherwise as I haue declared. As for the League you speake of with the Rebels of Scotland, I thinke there was none, and the tunc did shew what Rebels they were. But thinke I thinke they were as weary to haue you so neere vs. And therein I thinke the Queenes Majesty and they did agree. And to excuse the refuse of the ratification, by the not coming in of the Scottish Lords, which small reason to beare it: for the Treaty made betwixt the French King then, and the Queen of England might haue been ratified notwithstanding, whatsoeuer was betwixt him and the Scottish Lords his Subjects: for our fact and peace did not stand vpon their doings; which Treaty being it was not ratified, I say, the Queen my Sovereign title to the possession of Calis, by reason of that attempt standeth whole and entire vnto her.

The Scottish

But sir said he speaking to the King to say the truth I haue no commission, nor any commandement or authority to dispute or answer in these matters, but only to demand Calis and the other forfeits, and places according to the Treaty, which is so plain, that to mine opinion there neede bee no controuersie. And if there bee any doubt, now the time expired doth put it out of all doubt. But because you and the Queen haue charged mee that I know so much of the matter, as I cannot deny somewhat I doe, as hauing bene at the doing of a great deale in the dispute. Somewhat I mull, and may say for my selfe, lest it should bee thought that there were nothing to be said. Marry as I said, as Commissaire from the Queen my Sovereign, I haue nothing to say, but the demands onely, the matter being plain and in right iudgement, without controuersie, and also that I see no person here but such as be parties, and no competent person to bee iudge of the controuersie. Whereunto the Comptable replied and said, Who should bee iudge of that which is the Kings but himselfe? it is his, and none could take or give it to any other but himselfe: with that the Queen mother asked Monsieur Chancelier, why hee did not speake.

Kings title that was Calis.

(54) Who after some pause beganne a long and well composed oration, the sum whereof was this: That the present Kings right to Calis was long before any claime could be made thereto by the English, which was not much above two hundred yeeres, and then was it got by the fortune of warre; but more anciently, that it had bene the inheritance of France more anciently, as being vpon the Continent thereof, and not vpon any English ground. King Edward (quoth he) we grant want it, and your father noble King renuance it to his Crown. But the English will say they haue possessed and enioyed it many yeeres: Why so they did Aquitaine, Gasconie, and Guyen, and other dominions besides, which they claimed by our Elizer, the repudiate of the King of France, who was inheritrix vnto it: indeed some titles they had, yet so as they held them of the Crown of France: for the whole which in Calis appertained to you for our King: and so doth Calis which is of no great antiquity than I canred of: for Counte Bologna was the first that did inuoye it, being afore but a burgard, as the most part of the Townes of France then were. At the battell of Croisly, dolorous to vs, King Edward of England after nine monethes siege by compulsion had it surrendered, the poor inhabitants perished of life at the great fur of his good Queen, else had they died every mothers sonne, and so with white hands in their hands were expelled the town: To whom the King of France was so mercifull, that hee commanded of every thing vnto them, they should bee the first provided for: And I thinke when your father King Henry took it the English were likewise so feruad. These claime two hundred yeeres possession, the others before them, above five hundred yeeres: that God doth to punish, or to essay his seruants. And although the English claimed Gasconie, and Guyen, by succession of Blonnet, although Normandy by our williams, and Patricius by a Dowry of their mother, daughter of Philip de Arle. Yet to Calis they had no right, but onely by Armes, and by Armes your father againe recovered it. But since will say, by the peace at Brignoly, they haue right; I say for every man knowes what exceptions were taken at this peace: and I see, that so long a possession makes a prescription; I say no for prescription is among priuats men, but among Princes prescription cannot stand, and yet theirs was not much above two hundred, ours above eight hundred yeeres. But to you Monsieur L'Ambassadeur, I will say, that at the peace of Tripes in Champaign, were your selfe and Monsieur Threlmorten, both of you well able in such affairs, and nothing thereon done I doubt not without the Queen and Councils consent: no one word was spoken of Calis, which chiefly was the cause of the warre; so that all standeth clear for al which was then talked vpon, and it is a plain enuiflowe, that they did acquit their right thereto: This Article I say is translatiue in the peace of Caiffen in Cambray, and is no more but such as forgoeth all, or because

K k k k k k because because all small things cannot be mentioned in conference. But Callis was the chief point, which being omitted; say by meaning it was acquiesced. But now to your reasons Monsieur L'Amboisier, the Article for the lease of Callis at this treaty was forced in by you the English, who of all nations be the most wary and circumspect in making their peace. Whereupon the Queene of England layeth it out as a question, a main point, a circumstance, a gift, that a King of France would have invaded England. But every suspicion must not make a breach: for so whensoever any France should arme his men upon any occasion, his neighbours might say it was against him: And so you English lay gesses against the late King Francis the second. But the Queene of England was open favoured the Kings Realm, with a goodly pretence to keepe the townes to the Kings use, yet when alwas reduced into their due obedience, he would keep the town of Newham as a pledge for Callis, by which deed, she hath left all her right in Callis. And sheweth hath made a natural separation betwixt you and vs, a sure wall of defence, Ex petitis toto dantis orbe Britannos. So that naturally you ought to have nothing but peace and amity with us. But doe not thinke Monsieur L'Amboisier that I say this as fearing what you can doe: for there was neuer any King of France since Charlemaine so great as the King is now, had so many men of warre, so ready, and so good Soldiers: and yet his Highnesse hath desired the amity of the Queene of England, and the love of this nation: of which there is the more hope, if all these pretences and demands were cancelled, and Callis forgotten, which hath bene the continuall quarrell betwixt these two Realmes. You neuer read Monsieur Smith, that the French ever invaded England, I speake it not to your disgrace which are English, but to your praise; yet this I thinke, had there not bene so easie a desert, so convenient a place, and so ready, for you to make warre here, yet would not (as I suppose) have come hither so often, and troubled our Country, nor the amity betwixt you and vs. And I dare boldly affirm and gage any thing, that the Queene of England shall gaine more by continuall peace with vs, then shee shall doe by Callis: & therefore your Queene may leave off these demands and quarrells, and come to a perfect peace with vs, which shall be more profitable for both the Realmes, and thus I dare assure you, here is no Counsellor among of that dare once open his mouth to render you Callis for my part I will not be one to move or agitate thereto. Nor I said the Constable, and so all the rest.

(55) They quoth Sir Thomas Smith, Monsieur Chancelier, methinkes you fetch your Title very farre to have Callis, and howsoever the possession was cometh, by and by the right is his in possession, then by your reason all our dispensation is in vaine, and it maketh no matter, besides an mala fide possidet, the King once in possession as a thing returning to his primer estate possession or gotten of the enemy, yet admit no contract, or latter treaty, so as it doth appeare, yet open that which was thought of some men, and alwayes spoken, that what promise former was made, the French would never render Callis againe to the English, but keepe it still, per nos possgat: this reasoning passeth all answer, for whatsoever the Queene of England had done quasi facti: to ever shee had kept her treaty of this eight yeeres, though ye could object nothing against her, yet she should never have had Callis restored, to this kind of reasoning and to that, that no man dare move the King to render it being due, I cannot answer; but to this that toucheth my fact in the making of the Treaty in Champagne, where I must confesse, and am not ashamed, that I was a Minister, I doe not yet acknowledge that either I am worthy to be accounted so wise as you would make mee, nor our Nations always so circumspect in making Treaties with you, your owne Writers asserting otherwise, and gize you the praye therein against vs. But for the point wherein you touch vs, that the peace at Trent should be mutuo contra Titum, and wee should thereby acquit our right of Callis, it is Antistrophe, and turneth a great deale better vpon you. For it becaus our take was of our right to Callis, by reason of the attempt in Scotland, you of the forfeiture of it by reason of the descent to Newham, neither condescending to other, and not concluding thereupon, wee did agree vpon that Peace. And if that Peace doth make annuities, then the forfeiture of our right by keeping Newham, which you impute to vs is wiped away, noised and cled by this Peace; and our right which was not yet in esse, & causa dei mandam venit, remaineth still. So as it toucheth you rather than vs, and by this meanes have you nothing to say against vs, but wee still our right against you. But the truth is, as Monsieur Le Comestable here can tell, who was part the occasion that wee came to it; for when this was contended, that Callis was already due unto vs, you, that wee had forfeited it, so that wee could enter into no other Article of peace; why said you, have not wee the wit to make a peace, and make no mention of Callis: neither to speake of it one way, nor other: your time is not yet come to ask it, yet vs live in peace in the meane while, and let each France have right such as it is, released; whereupon you Monsieur L'Amboisier were one of the first that came with vs, and you know what passed.

(56) Tea (saith he) but we would never grant that it should be put in, that you should have Callis: you say true (saith Sir Thomas) not were that the Queene might should acquit it, nor the halldges neither. But in the end when it came to the Conclusion, as the Bishoppe of Orleans and Monsieur Bardouin can tell, it was agreed that expressly the right be referred, as well to that, as to any other thing, not expresse there mentioned. Comes also pretences & demands & similes exceptions & defences in apperance by the Treaty. And as touching Newham, Monsieur Chancelier, more in it twatching. The one, the first eare, the other, the keeping after the peace as agreed vpon amongst your issues. As for the first eare, I deny that our men of warre made any invasion or came by force. But being requested and desired aide of a great number of Noblemen, and other who were in peril and danger. And whether did they like invaders (I make for all the time that they were not assailed) spoile any, or robbe any I no, they tooke not an hancane or an egge, but they paid for it: I, if any complain I offer to pay it: This is no invasion, not no hostility: but the aid of a friend, and at their requests and pursuins: whose doings I, as well for matter of Armes, as for other things done in that tumult, you have declared by Edict to have bene done: a bon facit per vestre force, which may truly be said, for by their means and defence a great number of your good Subiects, as well men as women, as well Captives as Souldiers, of whom Monsieur Le Chancelier did now boast, as of other not Souldiers, are saved now to doe you service: which else should have bene a prey and spoile to them which fought but the ruine of halfe or third part at the least of your Realm. For the consideration of whom, yet in part may thank the Queene my Mistress. And this for the first dissent of our men. Now where Monsieur Chancelier saith that the Queene my Mistress changed her pretence, I will doe say shee kept her first protestation. That she would appropriate no Land, Towne, nor Fortresse of the King to her, nor shee did neuer claime Newham as hers, but coming peaceably into it, having bene at great charge and cost, it was both wildeome and reason all other being satisfied and content, shee should at the least have some reason offered her in her right to Callis. And otherwise shee did not hold Newham, which thing was manifestly declared at Gallies, where Articles were drawn not unreasonable, and the matter to farre forward that they were signed with my hand, and carried but for power and Commission to affirme them. But the mortality and pestilence growing so great in Newham,

The French had rather make faults then lose lands.

The benefit accruing vpon the French by the side of the English.

Newhaue, gave too much advantage, in this matter taken; and the reasonable dealings in this matter broke off, other meaning her Maestie had none.

(57) No said the Comptroller, what meant such preparation, and promise? I cannot shill of things, but in that art wherein I have been brought up and exercised all my life, I can shill little. There was such a number of Horse burnes for the carter's number of a Dragoon, such provisions of Games of Bacon, Cheese and other things, and above five thousand men, that am I sure went out of it, besides all those that were dead: can you make me believe that all this was for Newhaue alone? No Maesire (said he) I know what belongs to a Towne of Warre. Yea, said another and the Ships also that came: Nay said the Comptroller they came too late. Why, said the Queene-mother smiling, will you make us believe that all that preparation was for Newhaue alone?

(58) Widowde would, Madam, quoth Sir Thomas Smith, because the sea and winde doe not serue at all times, that there should be good store of all manner of provision. No, no (said she) there was a further meaning but as you have quitted Newhaue, so will you quit Calis, and let us be friends; I am able to say for those demands, nor of the sums of money for which you had H-flags. All is gone from you quite. Your Queene in coming to Newhaue hath quitted all. Shee must forget that matter cleane, and let us be friends still. The King my sonne hath offer as much friendship as need to be, but as for Calis ye must neuer speake of it. It is hard, Madame, said Sir Thomas Smith, for a man to forget his right, or not to remember a wrong offered. Nay, no wrong (said she) you have heard what Maesire Le Chamberlain hath said, and what all those of my sonne Counsell doe say. Madame (quoth he) it is for the most part piece that men be partiall in their owne causes, I doe assure you, that the Queene my Soveraigne doth thinke that she hath as good right to Calis as any Towne in England; and so doe all her Counsell: and whatsoever ye have heard, I am able to say for her right even out of hand, but they a great deale more. But Sir, quoth Sir Thomas, is this the final answer I shall have? Yea, said the King. That ye will not render Calis unto her Maestie, according to the Treaty, nor pay the five hundred thousand Crowns which is for the peice.

(59) No said the King, I will keepe them both according to the Treaty: well then said Sir Thomas I have no more to say, but to bring this report to her Maestie, which I shall be loath to doe: and thereupon himselfe, and Sir Henry Norris, rose up to depart, doing their obeisance. But you take not your leave, Maesire Le Chamberlain for altogether said the Queene. Yes forth said Sir Thomas. Doe you intend to come no more at Court? No Madame, except the Kings Maestie doe command me. But I am faine to carry this answer so precise, and that there is so little regard of the Queene my Soveraigne right. No right, said the Queene, for if there were any, the King my sonne, would be loath to offer her any wrong: ye have heard all the reasons, I am well that you will take upon you, you that are learned, to defend yourselfe escape. Ah Madame (said he) I see well, it is true on your part, that men be blinde in their owne causes and advantages. Surely (quoth she) the Queene (my good sister) shall have more advantage than as it is, there to demand Calis. And I pray you persuade her. I Madame, against her right? You must not say so, I pray you commend me hartely to the Queene, my good sister, and desire her to keepe the amity and love which I trust her and my sonne, and I shall be ready to doe her what for mee or pleasure I can quoth the Queen and so said the King. Thus this conference ended, and Calis kept still by the French.

(60) Now as these distillures fell betwixt England and France, and these broken Covenants ministered occasions to set each against others: So at the same time, the affaires of Scotland was carried with so violent a motion as set the Lords at dissensions, and the land in civill sedition; so as not onely outrages were committed vpon the best Subjects, but even vpon the vertuous King and Queene themselves, him they shamefully murdered in a most barbarous manner, and he they tooke prisoner, forced her to resigne government, and lastly to flye into forraigne parts for succour. But knowing that this Subject is to be writ with a farre more noble pen, and our extant relations from vacante and suspected reports; we will forcefull to intermeddle in the particulars of that Queene's affaires, excepting onely in such intercourses of State, as are women in ours, and cannot otherwise be assayed without maime of History; this onely in generall.

(61) Mary Queene of Scotland having imbarcked herselfe for France, where she well hoped to finde many friends; by contrary winde (accompanied with fixtene persons) landed at Workin in Cumberland, and from thence was conueied to Carlisle, to Bolton Castle, and lastly to the custody of the Earle of Sherburne. Whose troubles and misfortune, Elizabeth both pittied and sought to redresse; writing in her behalf vnto the Regent of Scotland, and blaming the Lords of the many wrongs done to their Queen, which indeede were intolerable to roiall authority, and such, as other Princes could not but looke to redresse, and reuenge; notwithstanding such was the distillure of those discontented Lords, or the frownes of those small times, that in England the remained ever after during her life.

(62) As the melours grew great betwixt these two great Queene, Elizabeth and Mary, by the working instruments of the Pope and forraigne Princes; so by the like meanes, were the like distillures bred and nourished in some of the greatest English Peeres, towards their Soveraigne, whose Peace, under pretext of Religion, they irreligiously disturbed. Among these, the first in rank, time and disloyalty, were the two Earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, who with Leicester Dukes, Nesbit, Norton, Tempest, Dawley, and others, purposed on the sudden to have intirized the Earle of Suffolk, the Queens Lieutenant of the North, in his house at Cressley, but therein prevented, they were enforced to keepe secret their intents, till some fit occasion should chaffe to be ministered. They had in readinesse against their rising, certayne English Priests, Morton, and others, with Buller and instruments of abolition, reconciliation, and taking of Oathes to the Pope and his doctrine, which was not so secretly done, but that Queen Elizabeth vigilant Counsellors had an inkling thereof.

(63) Thomas Perrie, (so was Northumberland Earle named) lying in his Castle of Towsey in Yorkshire, had gone so farre in his intended purposes, as he could not returne; who being sent for vnto the Court, strooke a great amazement and sudden feare unto the other conspirators heere; and his owne gilty minde was much more distracted, vpon notice that some forces were approaching for his apprehension; and whereupon all affrighted, he rose from his bed, and caused the Bels to be rung in a most confused manner, so that the Townesmen called, all sought to defend and follow him their chiefe Lord.

(64) The nest thus broken before the birds could well flye, he departed to Windsor, where he met with Charles Nesbit Earle of Westmerland, and his following consorts; who joining in Council, made no conscience to vndoe many true Subjects, and innocent men: Forshewing the Queens name in their Proclamations and Commissions, they commanded the Countrey to follow them in Armes; sometimes pretending the safety of her Maesties person, in danger (they said) by Treason in working; and sometimes in case of Conscience for restoring their former Religion, which if themselves should neglect, other forraigne Princes (said they) would doe, to the little perill of the Realme.

(65) In this zeale they hasted to Durham, with as forward an intcut as Ierobam did to Bethel, to set

(66) From thence they went to Tadcaster, Wetherby, and Bransham Moor, where they mustered hundreds hundreds of Horsemen, and some thousand footmen, intending therewith to march unto Turke. But their mindes altering, they fell upon Barnard Castle, which after eleven daies resistance, was yielded unto them: as that fortunate enurance did soo-animateth their rebellious conceits, as that in their letters sent to their favourers, they daigned their Sovereign no better stile, then Elizabeth the late Queene, pretended Queene, and so Queene indeede: as likewise did the Countesse of Northumberland in her Letter sent unto Shelsley, and others of the faction, in far worse termes.

They followed the enemy to North-Alerton, Croftbridge, Alke, Durham, Newcastle, and Hexam, came close at their heeles; whose power was so weak, and purle to empty, (being defrauded of an hundred thousand Crowns, promised them by the Pope, to maintaine the Rebellion) as that those Rebellions heads entered conference with Edward Dacres at Neworth, of their desperate estate, being both monileffe and powerlesse to withstand the puissance of the Lord General, now on their backs, as also the Earles of Warwick, and Lincolne, the Lords Ferrers, Willelmis, and Howard, approaching very nere them, came at Brewinbridge. No other succours their consultations could pitch on, then by flight into Scotland, unto those Lords that there stood out for the Romish.

(69) So the Night following they put it in practise, not bidding their intrapped traine once farewell, which as Sheepe without a Shepherd, stood gazing at their owne destructions, whilst Suffolk surprized them without any resistance. Upon whose ringleders, Justice is seized, that at Durham died, by Murthall Law, an Alderman, a Priest, and sixe six Confessors, and in the Countrey for a great Circuit, a great number of such as were forward in the Action.

(70) Not warned by these successes (which vinally prove unhappy, in such disloyal attempts) Lernard Dacres of Hartley began to gather head againe; whose aiders were the more resolute, in revenge of their friends executed; and women also became stout Soldiers in quarrell of their husbands, as forward enough, and too forward to mischiefe. They upon a more nere unto Neworth, to impeach the Lord Hunsford, that made thitherward, had set downe their battell in a triangle forme, where they continued a long and most desperate combat, but in the end were forced to give backe, and Dacres to flee from his flaine, wounded, and scattered people, towards

Scotland, the then Refuge of Traitorous transfugers.

(71) Scotland thus harbouring those disloyal English, and their owne Lords divided into feircall factions, some of them sought to concelle, and some to apprehend these guilty Earles: so that Westmorland, was shifted away into Flanders, but Northumberland, taken by the Regent, and committed to Custody, was afterwards sent into England, where having bene attainted by Parliament, upon the twentie two of August was beheaded at Turke: viling liberty of speeche, in anowing the Popes Supremacy, denying subjection unto his Soveraigne Queene, affirming the Realme to be in a Schisme, and her obedient Subjects no better then Heterodoxes. Charles Westmorland his consort, a person vicerly wasted by loosenesse of life, even by Gods iust iudgement, in the time of his Rebellion, was bereaved of children, and afterwards wandring in foraigne parts, had his body eaten with vicers of lewde cruelties, as is most constantly reported. But from these temporal proceedings (being the Domestick effects of a foraining cause) let vs a while behold the spirituall Romish of the Popes leaden Sword, vnturbated at Rome, to enpire and enflame such traitorous dispositions against England Queene.

(72) Nicholas Mercurius an Englishman, made Bishop by Pius Regimus, that Pontifical and furie Pope of Rome, who now having turned the key of his Conscience, and set wide open the doore unto the complaints of his Clergy, against those Christian Princes, that wraged inhibition to their positive Lawes (a Note indeed ill sounding in the eares of his fionnes) amongst others, this puppet Bishop, commenced a feined suite and plea against Queene Elizabeth, whom thereupon Pius (like a transcendent Iudge) deprived from all Princely authoritie, as one vncapable either of Crown, or Government, and with the curse of his Impious mouth, fere forth his Bull to gauge her Majesty like to those of Basilius, that encompassed Darius; the treasure whereof (if the words corrupt not the aire, and the ink the eyes of the beholders) shal Rand for ever as a Pillar of Saltpetre, Monument of shame to this Man of sinne: the transcript whereof, taken from the original it selfe, is as followeth.

The declaratorie sentence of the Vniuersall Bishop, Pope Pius the first, against Elizabeth the pretended Queene of England, and against the Hereticks that take her part.

Wherein also all her subiects are declared to be absolved from the Oath of Allegiance and any other due whatsoever, and besides they that doe obey her are pronounced accursed.

Pius the servant of the servants of God for remembrance hereby in time to come.

(74) He that reigneth above, to whom is giuen all power in Heauen and Earth, hath committed in fullness of power to be gouerned, one holy Catholike and Apostolike Church (where-out is no saluation) to one only in Earth, namely, Peter the Prince of the Apostles, and to the Roman Bishop the Successor of Peter. And him alone hath he made Chiefe ouer all Nations and Kingdomes, who may roote out, destroy, scatter, waste, plant and build: that the faithfull people knit together with the band of mutual Charity, might be kept in the vniuersity of the Spirit, and prebested in health and safety vnto their Satiour. For the vndergoing of which office we being called by the goodnesse of God to the gouernment of the said Church, doe refuse and omit no paines, labouring by all means that thin vniuersity and Catholike Religion (which the Author thereof for the trial of the Faith of those that be his and for our correction and amendment, hath suffered to be tossed with so great afflictions) might be preserved whole and entire. But the number of the wicked hath so much increased in power, that now there is no place in the world left, which they haue not attempted to corrupt by moit wicked doctrine, among the rest, Elizabeth the seruant of sinfullity, the pretended and vnlawfull Queene of England, with whom, as in a Sanctuary the moit wicked persons of all doe finde a refuge. This Queene, ruling the Kingdom, and monstrously vitiating by her selfe the place of the Supreme Head of the Church throughout all England, and the chief authority & iurisdiction of the same, hath reuoked againe to miſerable ruine this very Kingdom which was in a manner recovered againe to the Catholike faith and good deuotion. For the vse of the true Religion (which the moit lawfull Queene, Mary of famous memory by the helpe of this Sente, had repaired, being before by the Apostate, Henry the eight, ouerthrowne) now by strong hand restrained, and the errors of hereticks embraced and followed; she hath removed the Councell of State that consisted of the English Nobility, and filled the same with obſcure heretick fellows; she hath oppressed the Professors of the Catholike faith, and hath set vp wicked Preachers and Ministers of impieties. Shee hath abolished the Sacrifice of the Masse, Priests, Almes, disſtence of meate, single life, and Catholike rites. Shee hath commanded bookes to be let forth containing manifest Heresie, and her selfe viling and observing wicked Rites and Institutions, according to Cæſars prescription; hath also commanded them to be observed by her subiects. Shee hath presumed to cast our Bishops of Churches, Rectors, and other Catholike Priests, from their Churches and Benefices, and to dispose of them and other Ecclesiasticall livings among Heretickal men; presuming also to iudge of Church matters; shee hath forbidden the Priests, the Church and people, that they should not acknowledge the Romane Church, nor that they obey his Precepts and Canonial Injunctions, she hath compelled many to yeld to her wicked Lawes, and to forswear and abuse the authority and obedience of the Romane Bishop, and to acknowledge her by their Oath the onely Governour in temporal and spirital matters; she hath imposed penalties and punishments upon those which were not obedient to her command, and hath exacted the like upon them which persecuted in the vanity of the Faith, and in the aforesaid obedience; she hath cast into prison the Catholike Governours and Rectors of Churches, where many, laden with daily languishings and sorrow, have woefully ended their lives. All which things forasmuch as they are notorious and manifest to all Nations, and so approved by the most graine testimony of very many, that no way is left them, for excuse, defence, or evasion; We mone by the impieties and mischiefes that more and more manifestly, besides the grievances of the faithfull, the affliction of Religion which groweth daily more intolerable by the means and working of the said Elizabeth, whose minde is so hardened and indurate, that she hath not onely contemned the godly prayers and admonitions of Catholike Princes for her health and conversion, but also hath not suffered the messengers of this See to come into England to her about this business; We, I say, mone by these causes, have of necessity broken our selves to the weapons of Justice against her, not being able to refuse from griefe and sorrow, that wee must needs punish such a one, whose Ancestors have so well deserved of the Common weale, and of all Christendome. Being therefore strengthened with his authority, who hath pleased to set vs in this supreme Throne of Iustice, though vnfit for so great a burden, we by the force of our Apostolike power, doe declare the foresaid Elizabeth an Hereticke, and a maintainer of Heretikes, and those that take her part in the things aforesaid, to have incurred the sentence of Anathema, and to be cut off from the vinity of Christs body. And moreover that shee is deprived of the pretended right of her said Kingdome, and also from all Rule, dignity, and preheminentia whatsoever, and also her Nobility, Subjects and People of the said Realme, and all other which have sworn vnto her, by any manner of means are absolved to reuer from such Oath, and from all duty of Empire, fidelity and obedience, in such sort as we doe abillie them by the authority of these presents, and deprive the said Elizabeth of the pretended right of the Kingdome, and of all other things aforesaid. And we doe command and forbid all and singular of the Nobility, Subjects, People, and other aforesaid, that they presume not to obey her admonitions, commands, nor lawes. Whosoever shall doe otherwise, we doe enwrappe them in the like curse. And because it were too difficult a matter to bear these presents to euery place where there is need, we will that the Copies of them being signed with the hand of the publike Notary, and the Ecclesiasticall Prelate, or with the Seale of his Court, haue the same credit and authority in Court, and without it with all Nations euery where, that the prelates themselves should haue if they were exhibited. Given at Rome at Saint Peters in the yeere of the Incarnation of our Lord 1569. the fifth of the Calends of March, and of our Papacie the fifth.

(75) The webbe thus woven by these Spiders of Rome, and the Cockatrice Egge hatched into a Serpent, many were implored to patch vp this garment of iniquity, and Spies first abroad to corrupt Englands sweet aire; the one sort, plotters of insinuations to lay the Land waste, and the other, conspirators against her annoyed person. The chief of them both in this place, (omitting the order of Annales) that they may ranke together without interruption of better narrations, & not infect the paper in more places then one, I will heere lay downe; assuring my selfe, that many more attempts were plotted then euer were disclosed. For the thunderbolt of curses throwne from that Iupiter of Rome, denouncing her Maestie vncapable either of Crowne or Kingdome, tooke such rootes in the hearts of these Locusts, that they both armed themselves openly to batell, and secretly fought to imbrue their barbarous hands in their Princes blood.

(76) For this Brutish Bull, calld in the Popes Consistory (or rather Cow-house) and now able to trauell from Rome; in London and at the Well end of Pauls, first put forth his hornes, being there hung vpon the Bishops Pallace gate, by a lewde person imploied as an Herald from the Pope. Marian an old English fugitiue (as hath bene said) had procured it: brazen-faced Sanders in his writings maintaineth it; Brinsley in his Motives approved it; Northumberland & Nemil had put it in practice, Iohn Felton had dialged it, the two Norwies supported it, and many after-followers assaid to execute it; all which, like Serpents bite the bolosoma, wherein themselves lay, but neuer could hurt her, the Lords belind, and holy Annotated, who in pence & glory came to her grace, and in a full age, as a ricker of Corne into the Barne in due season.

(77) The Marthallists, besides them in the North, were Iohn Throckmorton, Thomas Brooke and George Redman with others, who intended with sound of Trumpet and Drumme, to proclaim their duellish deligne at Marston Faire in the Countie of Norfolke; their heere being for the imprisonment of Strangers, but their maine end, to make a strange alteration in the State; whereby they hastened their owne ends, suffering a death due to Traitors.

(78) But more dangerous were those Conspirators, which secretly plotted to bring in ferreigne powers, or publicly by their writings animated men therunto, defaming the faire face of Englands Religion, and deforming the body of Elizabeths Government; in which kinde Sanders and Brinsley two English fugitiues, were the lamnes and lambers that misflooded Moses; men of corrupt mindes, and enemies to the Faith; Traitors, heady and badly minded, having a flour of godliness, but denying the power thereof, as the Apostle prophesied, that in the last daies foreshould arise: both of them approving Pier Pontius his proceeding about her Marston depuration, and iustifying the wicked in their rebellions, contrarie to the doctrine of that Apostle, whose Chaire they pretend to uphold. From which kinde of iniquity, issued those corrupt streames, that became bitter as wormewood, the taste whereof brought many to their vntimely, but well-deserved, deaths: among whom, first was Felton, the two Norwies, Kensellorne, Barne, and Edmond Mathew; not long after whom, followed Doctor Stury, who may not bee forgotten in our Story.

(79) This man by birth was English, though an Alien in heart, by profession a Civilian, and Doctor of the Canon Law, a persecutor of Gods Saints in the daies of the last Queene, and in this Queens raigne, a turbulent inuisager against the Religion established in the English Church. For which being apprehended and committed to prison, he found means of escape, and in Antwerpe received Commission vnder Duke D'Alva, to search all Shippes coming thither, for English books; not forgetting his tyranny whereby in he had bene trained, nor to further traitorously many and great attempts to bring in ferreigne powers, for Englands overthrow. But the pit that he digged, he fell into himselfe, and the destruction prepared for others, light on his owne pate; for Colou Parker, an English Marchant, loyally affected to his Prince, trading to Antwerpe, laid his snare faire to catch this foule bird; causing secret notice to bee giuen vnto Stury, that in his Ship were store of Hereticall books, with other intelligences, which might stand him in fledge.

Cockatrice, hallooed to execute his Commiſſion himſelfe, where with lookes very bigge vpon the poore Mariners, each Cabbin, Cheſt and Corner, aboue board were ſearched, & ſome things found to draw him further on; ſo that the hatches muſt be opened, which ſeemed to bee vnrwillingly done, and great ſignes of feare was ſhewed by their faces. This drew on the Doctour to deſcend into the hold; where owne in the trap, the mouſe might well gnawe, but could not get out, for the hatches went downe, and the ſailles boyled vp, which with a merrie gale were blowe into England, where ere long hee was arraigned and condemned of high Treafon, and accordingly was executed at Tilbury, as he had well deſerved.

(81) To the like end came Sherwin, Campion, Kirby, with others ſeditious trumpetters of this infamous Bull, and Sander the Irish Legate, and greate maintainer of his goring authority, though hee eſcaped the Barre of iuſtice, yet was found out by a raiſing Phœnix, as he wandred ſuccourleſſe in the waile mountains of Ireland, wherein laſtly hee miſerably died. But to leave theſe poiſonous tougemen and libelous pen-men to reſpire their owne ſhame, and leave their conſciences with the brand of ſincke; let vs diſcouer thoſe other daring and ſwearing Monſters, who actually imploied themſelves, to lay, either violent hands vpon her Maieſties perſon, or the Land open to forraine inuaſions.

(82) The firſt of them (or firſt manifested) was Iohn Semmorie of Elſſome in Warwickeſhire, a furious young man, who like a tempeſt that threatened deſtruction, came ragingly forward towards the Court, with intent to murder the Queene; the progreſſe of which attempt ſommarily was thou. Keeping his ſpight ſent with Arden (his wiues father) he was there ſo wrought by Halls Seminary Prielt, as hee conceived a deſperate rage againſt her Maieſty, holding it a matter (ſeing there was no hope of alteration during the life of the Queene) meritorious to make her away; to which bloody reſolution, he was further inflamed by his wicked wife. Whereupon returning home, hee grew much perplexed, hauing many feares and conſults in himſelfe, which cauſed his wife to write vnto Hall, to come and ſtrengthen the man with firmer reſolutions. But hee, buſied elſewhere with the like purpoſes, by letter excuſed his not coming, yet therein adolied him to goe forward, promaiſing hee would aſſiſt him with his prayers to God for his good ſucceſſe.

(83) This letter reſcinded, hee grew fully reſolued to aduate the deſigne, and hallooed his journey a-mayue towards London, who no ſooner departed, but that his wife ſent Halls letter vnto her mother, and theer preſently made it knowne to Arden her husband, which letter hee cauſed to bee borne as ſoon as himſelfe was called to queſtion. But Semmorie diſcouered by the way, was indicted in Warwicke, and thoſe his Aſſociates condemned of high Treafon in London; Semmorie confeſſing his iocund ſaid, that hee had bene mooued thereunto by his wicked ſpirit, and by the incitements of certain ſeditious perſons, his Kinfmen and Allies, together with the often reading of pernicious bookes, publiſhed againſt her Maieſty. This deſperate Roſſian committed to Newgate, after his condemnation, moſt deſperately ſtruggled himſelfe to death, as an example of Gods ſuering againſt ſuch ſonnes of diſobedience.

(84) Of which litter in the dayes of this bleſſed Deborah, not ſo few as hundred and twenty of knowne Leſuites and Semmories ſcrawled like frogs, through her faire ſoile, croaking, and ſpawning their doctrine to recall obedience to the Pope, and diſſwading the Subjects from the allegiance vnto their Queene. Of this number fifty three with pardon of life were baniſhed the land, and the reſt as Traitors died for conſpiracy againſt her perſon, and breach of the law in that caſe enacted for the indemnity of the State. To ſhrowdethemſelues and their Diſciples from that daunger of law, as the ſoile of Campion, Perſons, Maynard, and Hart, a diſpenſation was giuen to the Catholike Catholikes, from the rigorous exteior of the forſaid Bull: ſo that moſt of their Seminaries imploied for England, caſt off their Serpentine ſhinner, and ſhewed themſelves abroad in the attire of Gallants, the more ſafely to vent their enenomed drugges, and to keep their Coales from preaching at the Gallows.

(85) To which end faculties were granted to Robert Perſons and Edmond Campion, vntill they could make their party ſtrong in England, which faculties were croggled on this wiſe; Petatur à Summo Pontifici uſque, expreſſis, &c.

Let there be deſired of our moſt high Lord an expreſſion or meaning of the Bull declaratory, made by Pius the fifth againſt Killicrobb, and ſuch as do adhere or obey her: Which Bull the Catholikes deſire to bee vnderſtood in this manner, that the ſame Bull ſhall alwayes bind her and the Heretikes, but the Catholikes ſhall by no means bind, as matters doe now ſtand or be, till hereafter, when the publick execution of that Bull may bee had or made. And in the Concluſion thus, The highſt Pontiffe granted theſe foreſaid Graces to Robert Perſons, and Edmond Campion, who are now to take their way into England the fourteenth day of April, in the yeere of our Lord 1580. beinge preſent, the Father Olivierus, Marſhall aſſiſtant. And though the one of theſe ſpiders ſpoune his Webbe ſo in cotoers, as bee could not be found, yet was the other ſwept downe by the hand of iuſtice, and drew his laſt thread in the Triangle of Tyboroc. After whom others, as ſome likewiſe before them, ploughing with the ſame Henſer, and ſowing the furrow with the ſame ſeed, reaped their harueſt with no better increaſe then tares or darnell could yeild, as was ſene by their ſucceſſes.

(86) Wherein Cuthbert Mayne in Cornwall had (before this time) borne a part, who armed with an Agnus Dei, and an old Copie for a new Iubile, with ſome other Writings, maintaining the authority of Rome, diſſwaded the naturall ſubiects from their due obedience, deſirating diuers holy Graines (as hee called them) by which, hee that had ſuch things bee knowne to bee ſure of that ſide, and thereby to bee defended in the bloody day, as by his inditement ſtandeth vpon Record, and colleſſed vnder his own baud.

(87) Nellſon, Hauke, Larter, Briant, Coten, and a great number of others, were all of them imploied, to draw the hearts of the Subiects from their Soeraigne, and to prepare way to an intended inuazion. And laſt maſſing Prielts ſhould bee wanting to make eaſie the ſcrues of their winding deuices, when their Cobwebbs were woven, Thomas brought Holy Oyle to beſmeare their ſhauen Crowns; Hemford a diſpenſation of Pius Quintus his Bull, not to extend to the Catholikes, vntill opportunity ſerued; and Wattſdenke was doobly employed, both to prepare aides to aſſiſt the enterpriſe, and to note the ſureſt landing places, for ſoeraine forces, which himſelfe ſent word to Doctour Allen hee had done.

(88) But Iohn Paine a Prielt ſtepped yet ſome what further, in praſtiting the death of her Maieſty, who with fifty Reſolutes, furniſhed at the Popes charge, was appointed violently to aſſaſſine her, beinge ſtenderly guarded as ſhee tooke her recreation abroad. Theſe and ſuch others are the men that are made Martyrs in the Popes Bead-rolle, as choſen viſſes to ſuffer for the Remitt cauſe, of which number Sanders was not worthy to be, as himſelfe Doctour-like ſignified in his letter vnto Allen, which here I inſert, according to the original, to ſhew what honeſt hearts he & his Mates did beare towards their Native Country.

(90) By this we see, what plottes were intended for the subversion of England, and what fruits those Italianate Fugitives brought forth; but as men cannot gather grapes from the Thorns, neither do finde the figges on the Thistle, so let these brambles bring forth their owne berries, and let their hands be prickt that seek to plucke them; as indeed they did, their of whom we are to write; whereof Francis Throgmorton a Gentleman well educated and of a good witte was one; who weary of longer delay, after so many yeeres plotting and consulting of an Inuasion, resolved to be the man himselfe, to bring the matter to an issue.

(91) This man solicited by Bernardine Mendez, the Spanish Legat-Ambassador lying in London, undertooke a most dangerous designe against his dread Soueraigne, and native Country, which was to bring in a foreign Army, and to alter Religion, with alienation of the Crowne and State. His imploiments was to found the haues for entrance, and to collect a Catalogue of the names of such great men in every Countrey of England, as stood for the Papall cause, vnto whom Charles Paget (masked vnder the names of Mope and Spring) was ioyned for an assistant. Sir Francis Englefield in the Low-Countries, and others elsewhere had vehemently solicited the King of Spain to attempt Englands Inuasion, and the Duke of Guise, undertooke to be the principall leader, conditionally that Rome and Spain, would beare the charge of the warre.

(92) For compassing this plotte, Throgmorton (for his part) had plotted a chard of the haucens and harbours of England, and gathered his Catalogue of Catholike aidens, which he presented vnto Medecia. In this his Sorow no place was held fitter to land these foraine powers, then was Arundell in Suffolk, both for the neere cutte from those parts of France, where the Guise means to muster his men, as also for the opportunity of assured pectons, to give them assistance, as they did presume. The want was onely Money; for which, messengers were employed vnto Rome and to Spain, whole returne was daily expected with bagges and Bills of Exchange, as they wished and well hoped, which confidently was assured by Bernardine Medecia, promising that the King his Master would beare halfe the charge of the enterprise.

(93) Thetreason thus forwarded and ready for execution, the Watchman of Israell, who euer wayed for the defence of his Anointed, and walled her inward with his owne protection,ooke out the fruite of this ill-concoited seed from the huske, before it was ripe. For Throgmorton suddenly apprehended, and his body searched, the Catalogue of Romanized Gentlemen of every Shire, and the Haucens for landing of forraigne power, were therein found: with certaine Penreues touching the title to the English Crowne, and some infamous libels published beyond seas against her Maiesties person. But a certaine Casket couered with greene velvet, was cunningly conuied from vnder a bed, and carried to the Spanish Ambassador, wherein many things lay hid that neuer after came to light; as also a letter which himselfe was then writing in Ciphers, hee conuied from the sight of the searchers: all which himselfe confessed, and with his owne penne wrote the whole Conspiracie, for which, after iudgement hee most worthily died.

(94) Nor waxed by these, William Parry (as hee named himselfe) a man of a profuse wastefull life, riot, and prodigality, hauing consumed two widows wealths and wounded his Creditor, by committing Burglarie, was for the fault condemned to die, but eased and obtained his pardon of life by the compassionate mercy of Queen Elizabeth, which hee, vngratefull man, sought to requite, by vowing her death, that laued him from his. For traouelling into forraigne parts, and there obtaining the title of a Christian Doctor, he fell from his natural allegiance (as rancorous Malecontents usually doe) and reconciled himselfe vnto the See of Rome, then hauing frequent acquaintance and conference with certaine Jesuiticall Priests, was finally inspired with a hellish resolution to kill her who had giuen him life.

(95) Whereunto hee was further incited by Bernardine Palmis a father lesuite, Christopher de Salazar, Secretary to the Catholike King, and Thomas Morgan an English Fugitive, Amias a Catholike his Confessor, approving the diabolical deligne; and Rapaccini the Popes Nuncio, promising that this Catholike service should be remembered at their Altar. Two things were yet wanting, to strike vp this Calistrophe, which were the Popes approbation, and his Absolution from all his sinnes: to procure which, Cardinal Come was employed, who if effectually followed the business, that both were shortly procured, and sent him into England with a warrant to proceed in his Holies service.

(96) This armed from Rome, his promises on earth, and his vovues in heauen, the worke seemed meritorious, and the Queene must die: to effect which, no lister way could be found, then to faine himselfe a false Traitor indeed. For hauing priuate access to her presence, was heard at large, that hee was the man who had undertaken her death, which to sound the deepe waters, and to beare life with the fairest hee promised to doe, with no intent, as hee constantly affirmed, to all that imposed charge, but onely to discover those who laid for her life. Her Highnesse (whose piercing vnderstanding was not easily blinded or beguiled with words) seemed to doubtfully to interpret his confessed fact, which yet three kepe secret from her nearest Counselliers) that hee in great feare departed; as how can a confidence be clogged but feare? Whereupon his late letters from Rome hee shewed; which seeming also to be little esteemed, and his suit to be M^r. of S. Katherine, verily reiected, confirmed more desperately his resolution to kill her and often hauing weapon, presence, place & opportunity, purposely thought to performe it, but euer was daunted when he beheld the glory of her presence, and Maiesty in her face, wherein to his seeming the Image of God, in her his Vice-gerent, was portraied, commanding him obedience, and threatening destruction to those who intend violence against his holy anointed.

(97) This second part thus saying, he sought to vndermine the wallies yet another way; his vovues resting in heauen were holy moities (forsooth) to this hellish act, and Aliter booke redoubling his former resolutions (wherein eueri word was a warrant for his prepared minde, and eueri line taught, that Kings might be depeined, excommunicated, and violently Parvins Treason detected.

For Francis was the prime man of the up for intelligence of State.

Parvins Treason detected under his own hand.

(98) The Gentleman, loathing this horrible intent, revealed the Treason unto two principall Privie Counselliers, and they unto her Majesty, who committed his examination unto Sir Francis Walsingham her principall Secretarie, a man of exquisite judgement, integrity and industry in all state affaires and intelligences; the Treasons then found out, and confessed by him self, were divulged by his voluntarie pen, and subscribed unto, with his owne hand, with many other circumstances unknowne before, and againe were seconded by another letter, written to the Lords of the Council, which here out of the Originall, I have inserted.

Parvins letter to the Lords of the Council.

(99) *My Lords, now that the conspiracy is discovered, the fault confessed, my conscience cleared, and made prepared patiently to suffer paines due for so heinous a crime: I hope it shall not offend you, if crying, Misericorde, with the poore Publicke, I leave to despair with cursed Caine. Caine's life is rare, and strange, and for any thing I can remember singular: a naturall Subject's duty to save the death of his naturall Queene, (so borne, so hallowed, and so taken by all men) for the release of the afflicted Catholics, and restoration of Religion: the matter first conceived in France, the service in general words presented to the Pope, continued and further taken in Paris, and lastly, recommended and executed by his holiness's disgested and refined in England, if it had not been prevented by accusation, or by her Majesties greater lenity and more gracious age of her Catholic Subjects. This is my first and last offence conceived against my Prince or Country, and death (I cannot deny) condemne all other faults whatsoever. It is now to be punished by death, or most graciously (beyond all common expectation) to be pardoned. Death I doe confesse to have deserved: life I doe (with all humble) crave if it may stand with the Queens Honour, and peace of the time. To leave so great a Treason unpunished, were strange; to drive it by my death, is example, were dangerous. A favour for want to take upon him such an enterprise, open such a ground and by such a warrant, hath not beene from England. To indite him, arraign him, bring him to the Scaffold, and to publish his offence, can doe no good. To hope that hee hath more to discover than is confessed, or that at his execution he will say any thing he hath written, is in vaine. To conclude, that it is impossible for him in time to make some part of amends, were very hard and against for my experiences. The he question then is, whether it be better to kill him, or (if the matter be mistaken) upon hope of his amendment to pardon him. For mine own opinion (though partiall) I will deliver my conference. The cause good Queene Elizabeth; the offence is committed against her sacred person: and (for any of her mercy) pardon is without prejudice to me. When this I say, as few words, as a man more desirous to discharge his troubled conscience, than to live. Pardon poore Parvins, and release him: for life without living is not fit for him. If this may not be, or be thought dangerous or dishonourable to the Queens Majesty (as by your favours I thinke is full of honour and mercy) then I beseech your Lordships (and no other) once to heare me before I be executed, and afterwards, if I may die, humbly to commend the Queens Majesty to hasten my trial and execution: which I pray God, with all my heart, may prove as honourable to her, as I hope, it shall be happy to me. who will, while I live (as I have done already) pray to Jesus Christ for her Majesties long and prosperous reign. (100) And according to this his last request, his indictment was framed, and arraignment performed at Westminster, where he pleaded himselfe guilty and had judgement of a Traitor. Which accordingly was executed in the Palace at Westminster, upon the second of March following; where (whether for feare of preiudicing and discrediting the Romanists cause, or by whatsoever other perswasion) he imputently denied, that he ever had an intent to kill the Queene, notwithstanding all his owne former confessions, witness of the fact, and other cleare evidences of truth; amongst which, the letter received from Cardinal Como is not unworthy to be here annexed, whose translation from the originall, written in the Italian tongue, is as followeth.

(101) Sir, his Holinesse hath sent you letter of the first, with the assurance included, and cannot but commend the good disposition and resolution, which you write to hold towards the offence and benefit publicke: wherein his Holinesse doth exhort you to persevere, with caution to be brought to effect that which you promise. And to the end you may be so much the more helpful in that good thing which hath moved you thereto, his Holinesse doth grant you plenary indulgence, and remission of all your sinnes, according to your request. Assuring you that besides the merits that you shall receive therefore in heaven, his Holinesse will further make himselfe debtor to acknowledge and requite your deservings, by all the best means he may. And that so much the more in that you will the more modestly in not pretending any thing. For therefore to effect your holy and honorable determinations, and attend your health. And to conclude, I offer my selfe unto you heartily, and with all good and happy success. From Rome, the xxx. of January, 1584.

At your disposing

N. Card. of Com.

(102) Had not then her Majesty iust cause to complaine, as shee did I when in the honourable assembly of Parliament, he openly professed, that shee knew no creature breathing, whose life stand honestly in more peril then her owne; and that even at the first contract into his estate, shee entered into infinite danger of life, as one that had to wrestle with many and mighty enemies. And yet, in confidence of her celestiall Protector, and of her owne innocency, shee often seemed somewhat too remissive and neglective in the care of her life and life as appeared manifestly by her proceedings with this last Traitor, in keeping his conference of that importance, from the knowledge of her Counselliers, and often admitting privately his access, though he had tolde her, he was the man appointed to worke her death. And indeed such was this Princesse's Magnanimity, that in an apparent danger, as great, though not fornicitous as this, shee shewed a resolution of courage farre above her sexe; when being in her Barge upon Thames to take the aire, accompanied with the French Ambassador, the Earle of Lincolne, and others, a Servingman in the Court with his Caliber discharged a Bullet, and thrust the Waterman, within five foot of the Queene (the second to her Bales) through both the armes; whereat all other being amazed, and the man abundantly bleeding, shee threw him her faviour, and with words of comfort had him be of good cheer, he should not want, for the bullet was aimed at her, though it hit him; and with such resolute courage bare it out, as all present admired. Neither so only, but knowing afterwards that it was done casually at random, shee both pardoned the parte of his life, when he was to die, and commanded his Master to retaine him againe into his service.

(103) And indeed, of so singular clemency, and imbred lenity was this Lady, that shee never heard mention of the capitall (though never so deserved) punishment of offenders, even of such as had sought her owne death, but it bred a kinde of horror and sorrow in her; whereby, had not her Counselliers earnestly inculcated the necessity of such exemplary justice, many dangerous attapters had escaped their due punishment. Which moved her to say, being once questioning with a great Divinie of Oxford, about bookes meetest for Princes to study on, that her Reading of Seneca de Clementia, had done her much good, but some would persuade her, it had done her State as much harme. But for her love to her people in generall, and tender care over the poorer sort, or any wales oppressed, it was incomparable; whose cares were not only open at all times to their complaints, and her hands ready to receive their petitions; but her manner was also to commend their cause vnto her Councillors and Iudges, giving them and the like earnest charges; I have care of my people, you have my place: do you to them that which I ought to do they are my people, yet every man oppresseth and spoileth them without mercy. I therefore can neither helpe myselfe: nor renewe their quarrells. See unto them, I pray you, see unto them, for they are my charge, then therefore I charge you with, even as God hath committed them unto me. I care not for my selfe, my life is not deare unto me, my care is for my people; I pray God my Successor here as carefull for them; and surely they which might know my cares for my people, may likewise conceive, that I take no great joy in wearing the Crowne.

(104) What heart then could conceive so great malice, or hand could bee so barbarously violent, as to worke the destruction of so loving a distracting Mother, but only those elaborate and enormous Pipers, which ease forth the way from the wombe of their owne conceptions? Or rather those Ring-tailed Locusts, arising with foggy smoke from the bottomme pit, who to reare up their Dreges or great King Abaddon, call downe Princes with the wings of their warre, and execute their damnable doctrine in the murther of the Lords anointed; whereas David durst not touch Saul, though he was afflicted by God.

(105) Those Protestants to vncfaintly, yeeve by yeere, prosecuted the Roman cause, that many of them thereby deliberately came to their deaths; amongst whom was Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, gone so farre in such dissoluit enterprises, as being vpon suspicion of Treason committed to the Tower of London, he laid violent hands vpon his own life, by discharging a Dagger charged with three bullets, vnder his left pappe, wherewith he pierced his heart, and presently dying, was by a Iurie found guilty of his owne death. The Treason laid against him (besides the former of the iniunction in the North, by himselfe confessed, and by the Court fined at five hundred Markes) was, that he had been pious to the Plots of Throgmorton, for the bringing in of Exorcise powers, to the destruction of the Queen and Realme; which truth being reuieued by other conspirators, he so deeply apprehended, as in that desperate manner hee preuented his further iudge-ment.

(106) In the same place (though after the Spanish attempt for Inuasion Anno 1583. which purposely we yett pass over, to asoide interrupting of particular men's Treasons and designs) Philip Earle of Arundell, and Sir John Perce last Lord Deputy of Ireland, both of them condemned of high Treason, by course of nature ended their liues; the one, fearing to escape the Land, was first fined at ten thousand pounds, and afterwards found guilty of a higher offence, had sentence of death: the other likewise, for plotting with Spain, to open their way into Ireland, gaue way to the Law to take hold on his life.

(107) Neither were these great ones drawne alone into the confederacie of Rome irreliigious purposes, but others also, thirsting for Englands destruction, of lesse quality or place, had parts appointed to be actors in the Scene; which parces themselves shal now enter the Stage, even fourteene in numbers wherof Anthony Babington Elquire, was the principall, the others were Chistie Tichborne, Charles Tilney, Edward Abington, Thomas Salisbury, and Edward Jones Elquires, John Savage, Robert Barnewell, Henrie Dux, John Tranter, John Charnock, and Richard Gage, Gentlemen, and John Ballard a Semina-rie Priest; for can there be any conspiracies hatched without them? The plot was the more dangerous, by how much the more secretly carried, and the parties resolute to venture therein vnto death, wherof fixe vnderooke to murther the Queen, and Savage bound himselfe for her death.

(108) The new must be against the precise Faritanes, whose chiefs or head in the Low Countrey, not only threatened (as was pretended) the destruction of all Romish Catholics, but also to violate the Crowne from the Queene; and therefore for the security of both, they were thus enforced to make ready for armes. Their siders in England were many, as Babington beleued, who wrote that the West parts, the North parts, all sides, the Counties of Lancaster, Darby, and Stafford, were in great forwardness, and had giuen heldey to giue aide to the enterprise. That Lord Percy could doe much in the North, Arundell in the South, and the Lord Paget in the heart of the Land, though two of them were then in Prison, and Paget in Spain; their only want was of a Noblesse to leade them, wherof they were deficite, as Babington complained, vntill it were Westmorland, and he out of the Realme.

(109) Their forme assurers were many and strong, especially Spain, as Mendoza assured them.
The Ports were appointed where the Inuaders should land; and once landed, should be seconded from all parts by the Italianized English, as they vainly hoped; the Spaniards surprised which held not for Rome; the faith restored that had been abandoned; and the vltimate Competitor (for so they termed the true anointed Sauvageur) dispatched by murther themselves the only men marked (if euer) now to redeeme the Land, from the seruitude and bondage, which Heresie had brought, with the losse of thousands of Soules. There were their glazes vpon Perus Raimus his alleged Text, and the faire vizards that hid their foules faces; whom God himselfe vanalaked to their following shame.

(110) For Ballard being sent to Mendoza, to signifie all things now in a readinesse, and ready to em-barke himselfe for France, was suddenly apprehended, and part of the conspiracy discovered. Where-vpon Babington, with Charnock and Savage, enters a new resolution, which was immediately to kill the Queene, whereas of their bounty it had beene ordered before, that shee should liue vntill the Inuasion, which was appointed to bee in September following.
But being intercepted before he well wist, he was committed to Custody, yet so he went abroad with his Keeper, from whom he shortly made his escape; and thinking to recover the Seas, disguised himselfe like a Labouring man, blaining with wallow-tree leaues his hands and face, which shadowed neither his shame nor sinne, neither yet could hide him from the eye that called him to account, for being desired and brought backe to London, he was with curies of the people committed to the Tower, whence he could not so easily start.

(111) The other conspirators, hearing of these their confederates successe, dispersed themselves and plaid least in sight, yet were they found out, indicted and brought to their tryalls, all of them confessing their Treasons without any torture. Yet at their arraignment (persuading themselves belike, that what they did by papall warrant, could not be called Treason,) they pleaded not guilty, which the Iury vpon manifest proofes finding otherwise, they worthily reuiedged iudgement of death, and died accordingly in Lincolnes Inne fields, even in the place where they had often conferred for the execution of their Treasons.

(112) The nest of conspirators thus broken in England, and their inares still filling though neuer focraftily laid, was a fore course to the English fugi-tices

times in other foreign parts; especially to the Iesuits, whose griefes were as great, as is the paine of a Scorpion when hee hath Runge a man. Among whom Lopez was a perfidious Traitor, and base Laundresse Ionne, seeing the Catholicks thus cast downe and their case desperate, if treasons were thus prevented and punished, pronounced this maxime out of his unwaived mouth, that the State of England then was, and would be so long as while Mistress Elizabeth (for so he termed his dead Sovereigne) were suddenly taken away, all the Duels in Hell would not be able to prevail against, or shake it. And Stanley that traitifous Champion for Spain and Rome, so impatient was of these vnprolept proceedings, that he hired Patrick Colles, an Irish Fencer and Russian, to undertake the death of the Queene; which he did for the summe of thirty pounds, but had no more for his money then the report of a Traitors death, which desperately hee suffered at Tyburne.

(113) To accompany and second these treasons of Colles, Crispwell the Legist lesuite in Spain, writ his traitorous booke vnder the name of Philopater, to ascribe him Cromwell alias Parsons, another Iesuite, and Rector at Rome, did the like, vnder the name of Doleman, concerning titles of the Crowne, both full of falshood, treason, and impudency, as (though the Authors be vnknowne,) whoeuer looketh on the brasse, will easily know their Fathers by the resemblance.

(114) This desperate designe failing, another as diuillish was affaid to bee practized, wherein, no English man was yet knowne to haue had any hand, the Actors being only Spaniards and Portugals, the one soliciting, by promises of great rewards, the other vndertaking to worke the death of the Queene; which was contriued, that poison should be giuen her in Physicke a designe indeed most feasible and inenitable, had not that heliish hand bene stayd by a heavenly. Rodericke Lopez was the Physitian, a Doctor of that profession and a Portugall by birth, in especiall trust and practise for the state of her health.

(115) Hee a fit instrument to set without suspect, received for an earnest, a treasure of gold, of good value, garnished with a great Diamond, and a large Rubie, from Christopher de Cetera, a speciall Counsellor of the King of Spain, whose lustre so dazzled his eyes, as the practise of treason possessed his heart, and vpon farther payment of fifty thousand Crownes, hee countermaund to take away her Maiesties life, in a poison giuen her vpon pretence of health. For the assurance of which money, Mmanuel Andradra, the bringer of the seruice, conferred with the Comde de Fuentes at Calis, and Stephano Ferrera, a Portugall also, did likewise with letters with Stephano Ibarra the Kings Secretary at Brussels, to make the same readie: Lopez himselfe assuring them the deed should bee done, when the money was paid, which daily was promised and daily expected; the onely day pretended was, that King Philip did not well like, that so base a person as Andradra was, should be employed in so weighty a cause.

(116) Whereupon Ferrera of better repute with the King, received bids of exchange for the money, deliuered by the Comte Fuentes, and from the said Comte, Mmanuel Lewis another Portugall, was presently sent into England to conferre with Ferrera, and they both with Lopez, who faithfully promised vpon the payment of the money to performe the villanie. At which very instant Gods mercy did bring to light the conspiracy, through the continuall vigilancy of some Lords of the Counsell, in which number neuer any Prince had more, Sapient, Serious, Provident, and experienced Sages, then shee had.

(117) And to make experiment of his intendments, Lopez was appointed to giue the Queene Physicke, who made ready the poison, and brought it to her presence. But her Maiesty knowing what hee least suspected, told him, hee misloughe misalter to the Lord Treasurer, Cecil, who at that present had more need of Physicke then hee selfe; whereupon Lopez with double diligence repaired vnto him, signifying his couming was to minister his Lordship Physicke, so commaunded him by the Queene: yea marry said the old man but what is your Physicke! a purge and it please your honour said Lopez: a purge Master Doctor said the Lord Treasurer, I thinke I must become a Physitian to purge you, and thereupon hee apprehended him for a Traitor, who stood so perplexed with feare, that his presence was scarce tollerable for the linell. Then other Doctors of Physicke were called, for to examine the ingredients, who easily found that the poison was poison, for which hee was indicted and arraigned at Barre, where hee pleaded noe guilty, and his two Comparts by long circumstances sought to save their liues, yet their former confessions furnished with their owne hands, gaue sufficient testimony of their guiltes, for which at Tyburne vpon the twentieth of June they suffered death.

(118) Stephano Ibarra thus failing of his purpose, by their Portugall sale, sought yet to euile the fabrick of his wicked intents, vnder the resolutions of some English fugitives, among whom none were held more fit then Edmund Turke, and Richard Williams, fouldiers by profession, and two desperate Champions for the quarrell of Rome, vnto whom Hugh Owen an English Rebel, and Spanish Presbiter, shewed an assignation, vnder that Secretaries hand, of four thousand Crownes to be giuen them for to murder their Queene, and for assurance that the same should be forth coming, the assignation was deliuered in Deposite, to Edmond English Iesuite, who producing the Sacrament and kissing it, tooke Iohanne Oath to pay the money as soone as the fact was done.

(119) To forward this enterprize, three severall consultations were held at Brussels, wherein Henry Iane was President, and William Stanley Proctor for this diuillish designe, animating Turke by his vnder example, to be constantly resolu'd, as a man ordained for his Countries good, and though many had misseried in attempting the Act, yet that it was meritorious and eulie to be done. Thomas Thiermerion, Atterbell, Meddie, Charles Page, Henry Owen, Edmond Garret, and the two diuine Doctors, Gifford and Wentington, were principall speakers in this impious Parlement, all of them eager to egge on the two vnderwriters, and to ioyne to them a third man, named Young, whose task should be to kill the greatest Counsellors, as soone as the Queene should be dead. The last that spake was Henry the President, who after hee had ministered these Traitors their Ombes in the cunning wise, menaced to take from the English this high and acceptable seruice, and to employ therein Strangers, who were farre more worthy: and so sent the two formes into England with his blessing, which neuertheless could not save them from the Gallows: their purposes were to get entertainment of some great Courtier, the better to effect what they intended, and to seeme men of some note for intelligence, sent from Calis to procure their passport, but the vigilant eye of the English state had found out their treasons before, & bringing them after wards to their trials, they were found guilty, judged, & died liberticides.

(120) The last publike attempt, that assailed the Queenes death, was Edward Sparre, a Sericuer of Greenwich, who by deputation had employment of a Purueyer in the Stable, but being in waite about his vocation, and carrying his fables about his fortunes, put himselfe in action for Sea in the last volage of Sir Francis Drake made into the Indies. Embarked he was in a small shippe, called the Frances, who looting the Fleece about Guadalope, was taken by five Spanish Frigates, and with other brought Prisoners into Spain: where falling in acquaintance with Richard Walspole an English fugitive by order a lesuite, so great credit, and vicar General to Parsons, in his absence, was by him obserued to be of more capacity then commonly was found in a man of his quality or education; for yeres, mature, and passed his middle age; for carriage well aduised, and resolute enough, if not too much, in not apprehending his eminent danger.

(121) Vpon him Walpole therefore meant to worke, conceiuing for his purpose two speciall advantages: the one, that coming into Spaine a Prisoner, and not a fugitive, his returne into England would be without suspect; the other, that Squire had beene employed in the Queenes Stable, and therefore had liberty of free access: But the more to inuolue what hee intended, hee subtilly caused Squire to be apprehended by the Inquisition, and put prisoner into the holly House: where mollified by distresse, hee got his heart into his hands, so that of a Neuter he became a fixed Romanist.

(122) This first assay proving effectually, for an introduction to his further incitements, he fell into the old song, whose burden was the tyrannies vied, and the persecutions exercised in England against the poore Catholics; vpon how few persons the English State did stand, and how easily those props were to be remooued, if any deuoted would put to their hands. Squire who wanted no wit to perceiue whereat hee aimed; first, gaue some slight signification, and after a more serious protestation, that hee was the man, that would sacrifice himselfe and his seruice in the cause.

(123) The good Father basing thus got him into the circle, began then the charme: It were said hee doubt a worke monstrous to kill the Earle of Essex; but vnum necessarium, one thing is necessary: And then told him plainly, that he meant to put a seruice vpon him of great worth, and reward; which he might accomplish without any euident perill of life, because it was to be done not immediately vpon her person, nor in her presence, neither yet in doing it (though hee were leene) should be endangered, being acted as hee would prescribe; and that was, to imposition the pommel of the Queenes saddle, at such time as shee should ride abroad, the Pommel being the place, wherein shee would rest her hand, and her hand not vnlikely to touch her mouth or nostrils, would giue access to the forcible poison. This said he, might easily be performed, he hauing familiar acquaintance in the Curry, yea and that very safely, as by otherwile, and immediate death happened, should be attained, that for the exchange of this present and transitory life, to charge the state of a Glorious Saint in Heauen.

(124) Which Squire long ended, and Squire inuigiled, confessions, voves, promises, recite of the Sacrament, and all, confirmed the resolution of the duellish attempt; and to preuent varying from this Center, Walpole would him, that were he stood in the state of damnation, if hee did not his uttermost endeavour to performe his vow, bidding him remember, how that the fumes of backsliding did seldom obtaine pardon; and if hee did, but once make doubt of the Immortall or merits of the Act, strait enough to cast him head-long downe into hell; and if hee did conceiue any difficulties, hee wished him to consider what it would be to win the whole world, and to lose his soule soule.

(125) Squire thus armed (though not with that complete Armour of the Apostles) fell downe in confession before this Refugee teete, whom he lifted vp, hogd him about the necke, with his left arme (such were Squire owne words) and crossing him with his other hand, mumbled a few words in Latine, and then distinctly in English spake thus: God bless thee, and give thee strength my Sonne, be of good courage, I praiue my Soule for thee, and thou shalt haue my prayers dead and alive. Therupon deliuering vnto him the poison, directed how it should be used, and shewed him the nature of the confessions, which was, to bee put into a double bladder, and wher it was to bee employed, to be pricked full of holes, and so pressed out vpon the pommel of the Queenes saddle; the operation whereof was such, that vpon his hand hee must haue a thicke double glove, lest the poison thereof should infect himselfe; whose vigour also was such, as neither continuance of time, nor subtilty of ayre could checke or vntwaine the strength: And that the matter might be carried without all suspect, an exchange was accepted of two Spanish prisoners in England, for Kerries and Squire, to be released from Spaine.

(126) Thus himselfe poisoned in heart, and minding to poison others, being monied by the Is-faire, arrived in England, not long before the expedition for Cadix; which action (as hee thought) suited him well, and therupon made suite and obtained it, to attend the Earle of Essex in his owne ship; as well to be absent when the poison should worke on her Measly (which he meant to bestow before his departure) as to haue opportunity thereby, to poison the Earle himselfe. Occasion being giuen by the Queenes riding abroad, and her Hottie made ready and attending in the Stable-yard, thether Squire repaired, full of evil spirits; and laying his hand vpon the pommel of her Saddle, bruiued out the poison in the bladder, laying cheerfully, God save the Queen; with no better affection then Isab bid to Amala, when with his hand hee took him to kisse him, but with his sword strook him to the heart. His part thus plaiged, Gods wanted and wonderfull protection beganne, who vnder his Canopy or wings of mercy had euer shadowed her from the stroke of danger; for albeit the season was hot, and the veins open to receiue any maligne tainture, yet her body felt no distemperature, nor her hand felt no more hurt, then Pam did, when hee strooke of the Viper into the fire.

(127) The deed thus done, without all mistrull, Squire taking the remaine of the poison, within fixe daies after departed to the Sea, and had his entertainment in the Earle of Essex his owne Ship, where looking to finish his double desire betwixt Faust and Saint Michaels bestowed his confession, vpon the pommels of a woddren chair, wherein the Earle usually ate at meales: which in like manner (the Lord so working) took no effect, to the no little admiration of Squire, though very well satisfied, that the default was not his, but rather in the poison it selfe; and his vow now discharged (as hee thought) he slept the more quiet.

(128) Walpole the lesuite out-tickled with ioye of his hoped Lucifer, and not able longer to keepe secrecy, imparted his treasons to his companions in Spaine, who together with him daily expected the issue thereof, but all things silent, and no newes of the Catastrophe, they changed their opinions, and held Squire for a fall-brother; when also their long-ing hearts beganne to feare, lest the maine cause would bee mard, being cast into so bad a mould. Wherupon a confabulation was called, and the Sicophant condemned in the highest degree, whose end must be speedily wrought, or else those Catholic proceedings would surely come to wracke; for that hee knowing much, would (as was feared) reueale much more; and therefore it was politically concluded, that one should be let slip from them into England, to giue information of Squires treasons.

(129) This man to haue the more credit brought hie two letters in his budget, the one he affirmed, himself had stolne out of a Equits study, & the other brought from another person, both which indeed were found to be counterfeited, and Squire for the present repented an honest man. Yet because the matter was tender, and touched nere the quicker, Squire was sent for, and examined; at first hee denies all, but coming to circumstances, something was found, should taken, and the Traitor committed to Prison; who left alone, began to berhume him how farre his Confessors Confession might extend, and therefore by good Counsell (the truth withall working) therein was abroad, hee feared to heare some news of desperate mis-chiefe, and prayed before God, hee never saw the light of the day, but that hee feared, before the Sun-set, to heare of some strange attempt.

(131) For as the Pope had denounced vnder his Bulls, an absolutio to him that would deethrow Elizabeth Englandes faire Queen so were there many foule minded Profelites, that repured her blood as an acceptable sacrifice, which many times they fought to offer vnto their God; but hers and our God, the Watchman of Israel, neither slumbered nor slept in protecting her Person as the apple of his eye; whole last defence, her innocency, and their bloody guits, haue often diuulged to the whole world; neuer any Prince escaping so many dangers, as this most mild and magnificient Queene in her daies had done, and many more no doubt were put in practice, which lay groeling in darkenesse, and neuer came to light, and as the works of darkness, so let them lie, and let vs hasten to our former, and faire more pleasing Subiect. Having therefore from the yeere 1570. made our digression, for the closer relation of all those treacheries together; let vs thence pursue the ensuing occurrences of her raigne and life.

(132) The troubles of Scotland were about that time, great and many, and much the mote by the death of the uew Regent, who was slain by the hand of Treason, with the shot of an Harquebussie, as he rode through Lathgus, mistrusting no danger, at which time a Roade was made into England, by such a little regarded peace. Whereupon Suffox the Earle General, accompanied with the Lord Hanf-don, Governour of Burwick, in Hostile manner entered that kingdom; and in Tumult did much hurt to the Inhabitants.

(133) New troubles then arising for the death of the Regent, and the Land full of factions, charactering ciuill broiles, the English Queenes aide was sent for, by some of the Lords, who with their helps, preailed in winning and demolishing many strong and faire Castles. And the Earle of Lennox lent into Scotland by her Maiesty, was first made Lord Governor, and after L. Regent, by the election of their three estates, who afterwards was as trayterously murdered, as the other before him had beene, which caused great troubles in Scotland; yea and some Nobles of England were not exempted from the same.

(134) For Lord Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, intending some fauours for the Scottish cause, proceeded to farre therein, as the letter of the Law took advantage of his life, to the great sorrow and lament of very many. For being a man filled with fauour, both of his Prince, and of the People, fortune at length made him a Ball for her banding; who first from Burrow besides Windsore was brought to Westminster, and thence by water was left prisoner in the Tower, where he remained from the ele-uenth of October, vnto the fourth of August following, and then was removed to the Charter-House nere Smithfield, where he abode thirtene moneths space; til lastly he was sent backe againe into the Tower, where, vpon the hill and Ordinary Scaffold, he penitently suffered death; being the fifth vnfor-tunate English Noble that for offence lost life since Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne.

(135) About which time, a strange case (which we will infer, rather to shew the course of Justice and mercy of the Queene, then for any other great use in Story) happened at the Common-law barres: where Simen Lane, and Iohn Kyne were Plaintiffs, for a certaine Manor and demaines in the life of Harry, ad-ioyning to that of Sheppey in Kent, wrongfully possessed (as they alleged) by Thomas Paramour, against whom they brought a writ of right: the defendant offered to maintaine his title by Combat, which the Plaintiffes accepted, and brought their Champions before the Iudges to the Barre. For Paramour was George Thorne, of a bigge and broad life, who cut dwn his Gantlet as Challenger, to iustifie Paramours right, which was taken vp by Henry Naylor Maile of defence, a man proper and slender, and not very tall, who appeared for Lane and Kyne, to make good their claime.

(136) The place appointed for Combat was in Tuttle-fields, where a plot of ground of one and twenty yards square, was doubly rayled, and without the Well-square a stage set for the Iudges, representing the Court of Common Pleas, behind the which two Tents were pitched; the one for Thorne, and the other for Naylor, the field with Scaffolds on euery side for people to see: All things thus ready and the day drawing on, her Maiesty, who euer abhorred all bloodshed, tooke the matter into her owne hands, and gave command and directions for the parties agreement, with a furcale from all further suite, which could not well be, vnlesse the Champions appeared in field; who altogether ignorant of what was determined, vpon the day assigned appeared in place. Thorne was there first who was brought to his Tent by Sir Terence Baner; then came Naylor, hauing the Gauntletborne before him vpon a swords point, a truncheon (taper-wise) ript with home, about an elle long, and a shield of hard leather carried after him; and so was conuoyed to his Tent by Sir Henry Chieuy.

(137) The Court set, and the Combaters called, Naylor entered the lists, being led by the hand by Sir Terence Baner, where making his obsequie, hee came to the barre, and there held vp his Shield. Then was Thorne brought into the lists by Sir Henry Chieuy and with like reuerence hee held vp his Shield.
Whereupon sooth was ministred to the approuer, the tenor wherof he spake as followeth. Here thus you Iudges, that I haue this day neither eate, drinke, nor haue vpon me either hose, shoe, nor gaffe, nor any enchanment, sorcery, or witch-craft, where-through the power of the word of God may be mislead or diminished, and the Devils power increased: and that my appaile is true, so helpe me God and his Saints, and by this Booke.

(138) Then was Proclamation made in her Maiesties name, that no perion of what soeuer estate, degree, or condition there preferre, be so hardly to giue any token or signe, by countenance, speech, or language, either to the prouer, or to the defender, whereby the one of them may take aduantage of the other; and no perion to remouee, but keepe still his place: and euery perion to keepe their flau-es and their weapons to themselves; and suffer neither the said prouer, nor defender to take any of their weapons, or any other thing that may stand either to the said prouer or defender any auale, vpon paine of forfeiture of Lands, Tenements, Goods, Chattels, and Imprisonment of their bodies, and making fine and ranfome at the Queenes pleasure.
But when all these Ceremonies were ended, the Lord Chief Iustice stood vp, and forbad the proceedings, aloting Paramour the Lands with the

(139) Peace flourishing in England, to no great liking of the Seminary, that often sought to disturbe it: the Regent of Scotland craued aide of her Maestie, for the defence of they young King, and the Countie, endangered at that time with civil broiles. She at tender in her affection, as he dutifull in his allegiance, sent him fiftie hundred men, whereof Sir William Drury Knight Marshall of Berwick was General. These coming to Edinburgh laid battery to the Castle, with no lesse then thirty Cannon, and were as valiantly resisted by the Scottish within, but for want of fresh water, and no aide to bee expected, the soldiers sick, hurt, pour-wearied, and divided in opinion, Lord Peter being let downe from the wall, by composition the Castle was surrendered, to the vic of they young King, wherupon the English returned to Berwick.

(140) This time of Elizabeth, like unto that of Agastyl, when the Temple of Ianus stood (for the most part) continually shut, made London like Rome, to be most magnificently repaired, and with many flourish adorned; among which forbeauty and commodious vie, none is more famous then the Royal Exchange (so named by her Highnesse) whose Founder was Sir Thomas Griffin Knight, Agent to her Maestie, built for the confluence and commerce of Merchants, whose Traffikes were great, and in these times of peace, extended their Navigations into the farthest (and till then, vnsearched) parts of the world.

(141) For the searching and vnquiet spirits of the English to the great glorie of our Nation, could not be contented within the banks of the Mediterranean or Leuant Sea, but that they passed farre, towards both the Arcticke and Antarcticke Poles, enlarging their trades into the West and East Indies: to the fourth of whose passage, that worthy Sea-captaine Sir Martin Forbusher, made Saile into the North-East-Sea, farre further then any man before him had ever done, giuing to these parts the name of Queene Elizabeths forland.

(142) The next yeere he attempted shirre leagues further, when finding gould Ore (as was thought) and taking a man, woman, and Child, of the Savage Catagayes, he returned into England; but as his gold proved drossie, so these lived not long, neither turned that discovery to any great profit, though it was againe the third time alaied by himselfe, and since by other most famous Navigators, the North-west by Englishmen being lately desired, to bee Sea more late, and the passage of farre better hope.

(143) Among these Sea-worthies our famous Pfizer, Sir Francis Drake is the first in the rancke, who the yeeres Christ Iesus 1577 and sixteenth of November set saile from Plimmouth in a Fleete of six ships, and one hundred, sixty foure men, who having port of Cape de Verde, in the beginning of February, he law no land, till the fifth of April followiug, being past the line, thirte three degrees of latitude, in the 36. degree entered the River Plate; whence he fell with the fruits of Magellan the one and twentie of August, which with three of his ships he passed, having call-off the other two as impediments vnto him, and the Marigold told from her Generall after passage, was no more seene; but the other wherof Master John Winter was Capitaine, shaken also off by tempest, returned through the Straites, and recovered England; only the Pelican wherof himselfe was Admirall, held on her course to Chely, Cogswin, Cumana, Palma, Lima, vpon the West of America, where he passed the line the first day of March, and so forth till he came to the Latitude 47. thinking by those North Sea to haue found passage to England. But fogs, frosts and cold windes forced him to turne his Course South-West from thence, and came to anchor 38. degrees from the line, where the King of that Countrey preferred vnto him his network Crowne of many coloured feathers, and resigneth therewith his Scepter of gouernement vnto his deuotion, his people to admiring our men that they sacrificed vnto them, as to their Gods. This place for the glory of England, he named Vnus Albin according to her ancient name; and at his departure reared a Monument to witnesse what there had bene done, which was a plate of brasse fixed in an eminent place, wherein was engrauen her Maesties name, and her right to that prouince, as freely giuen vnto her departy both by King and people. Whereto also was written the yeere and day of their entrance, and of the lands deliuerance; vnder which plate he put her Maesties picture and armes in a peece of Sallet to retaine the memory of this seruise vnto posteritie. From thence the fourteenth of November he fell with Ternate one of the Isles of Malacca, being curiously enured of the King, and from thence he came vnto the Isle of Celebes, to Lana Maier, to the Cape Buena Spérance, and fell with the Coasts of Guainea, whence crossing againe the line, he came to the height of the Azores, and thence into England vpon the third of November and yeere of Saluation 1580. after he had bene at Sea with such fortunate successe the space of three yeeres lacking twelue daies. The small vessel wherein this admirable voyage was performed, was, at her Maesties commandement, laid vp in the dock besides Deptford, where it remaineth as a monument of Englands great fame, vnto this day; and the worthy General honoured with Knighthood, being the first that by trauell encompassed the Earth, and law the wonderful works of God in those great deepe.

(144) The Seas thus knowne, our Merchants began to trade with the Mozambiques, and Turkes, whole priuiledge for Traffike the Great Sultan them, confirmed vnder his Regall Seale, and at their Ambassadors request (without direction from her Maestie) made peace with the King of Palat, as by his own letters sent vnto our Queene is apparant; the Coppy wherof being deliuered vnto mee by him who had bene Deputy Ambassador in Constantinople, I haue here inserted, translated word for word, as followeth.

The Sultan Murat his letters to her Maestie.

(145) Most glorious, and in brightness most glend woman, and of wises the chiefest Prince of the mighty followers of Iesus. Queene of the most famous Kingdome of England, most excellent Elizabeth, most sapient Gouernesse of all the affaires of thy people, and founder of the Naturals, the most pleasant Spring of brightness and glorie, the most acceptable cloude sweet flowers, the heire and Lady of perpetual happinesse, and blessednesse, of the most famous Kingdome of England, to whom all distressed soules do flucke for reliefe. I am willing from God the mighty Creator the most fortunate increase of all the affaires of thy excellencie and happy successes, and offering eternal vices and praiser worthy of our mutual and personal familiarity and league, and declaring the promises, and that which followeth with iugal decrements: We giue you to understand most friendly that euery yeere passed we had continual wars with Catholike Prince of Portugal in right of our people, by reason wherof we would not make warre upon other parts, wherby certain times in the parts of Polonia, called Calixti, and other wicked persons lurking in those confines, daily troubled and grieved our Subjects: now the Perlian being vanquished, and by the power of the Almighty Creator, matters in those parts being compounded, are determined to punish the said persons lurking in Poland, and other parts; and by the Belgerby of Greece our wars being ended, and sent with our charge by a Prince of Turkey, in the yeere last passed, a part of the Kingdome of Polonia, was as our behalfe troubled, and wretched, and the said Catholicks, and other wicked persons were punished accordingly to their deserts, which the King of Poland seeing, and sending two messengers to our blisful Part, to enquire, fade out, and punish in full punishment, signified so much unto us, and required our acceptance of his presents; but we would not allow his petition, but had fully determined againe to find our Army against the said King of Poland; but the Ambassador of your Majesty remaining in our blisful Part, interposing himselfe, and signifying that he did wish your excellency, with Corne, Gun-powder, Meats, and other things, necessary for warre, out of the confines of Polonia; now when as the Kingdome of Polonia by our means was troubled, and your Ambassador declared unto us your singular and peculiar pleasure, the same his declaration and intercession was unto us gratefull and acceptable, and your excellency is whom we owe all favours and honour. We wrote our letters to the King of Polonia in this manner, that the said factions wicked persons and Catholicks should be found out and fully punished, but if on the behalfe of your Majesty, a lasting league of peace had not been solicited for the King of Poland, we would not by any means have entered League with him, but only at your request we have shewed this grace to the said King and his subjects, and for our familiarity is mutual and perpetual, we thinke it convenient that your Majesty among your selfe with the Kingdome of Polonia, doe not leave to continue warre with the King of Spaine, who seldome time hath kept warre against you, and if your Majesty be not grieved to write letters by some trusty man, we come, by the aide of the Omnipotent Creator, that all necessary things shall bee on our part furnished and ordered, that speedily dispatch may be made unto Spaine wherein for our parts no assistance shall be wanting, whereof you may nothing doubt. But from these farre trauels, long, and chargeable adventures, let vs returne to our deere home proceedings vnder the Government of our prudent Queene Sherba.

A.D. 1583.

(146) Gregory of that name the thirteenth, and fourteenth man of Rome seeing Pope Pius his thousandbolts fall short of the marke whereunto they were aimed, thought it necessary to raise that begun foundation (though with ill burnt bricke, and bad tempered mortar) as that his mounted Cannon on the height, might reach and command where the other had left: To which purpose hee solicited Philip King of Spaine, after his fortunes had set him in Portugal Anno 1582 to undertake warre against Queene Elizabeth either directly or vnderhand, in fauour of the Irish Rebels, vnto which charge he offered not only his holy blessing and spiritual treasure, but also to acquire him of the fruites of the Arch-bishopricke of Toledo, long retained in his hands, whilst the Archbishop remained suspended, and the King received some millions of Crownes, which the Pope claimed to belong vnto the See of Rome. But Philip not yet ready to attempt vpon England, joined with him for the Conquest of Ireland; the one, leading sixe hundred men vnder the command of Thomas Stukely, whom he had lately stiled Marquess of Ireland, (a profane and defamed person throughout all Christendome, flying out of England, for his many Piracies, and now implored to follow the consecrated Standard of the Church;) the other, bearing all the charge with an addition of three hundred Spaniards sending money with them to wage foure thousand men more; and the more to kindle the flames of Rebellion, Dudley Sanders (the Arch-Rebell and English Fugitive) was sent from the Popes holy side.

(147) These landing in Ireland and Countie of Kerry, vpon a Promontory shooting it selfe into the Irish Sea, raised their consecrated standard, built their Fort Del-Ore, and with many threats gave forth that the Countrey should shortly know wherefore they were come: and Desmond, a man desperate to cull, put in action by papall auctoritie, had laid his hopes no lower (by these aides now armed) then presently to become the sole King of Ireland, as Escadad boasted our Ireland before his haraſſe was put on.

(148) To salure this puppet King, and to welcome these papals with such entertainment as his martiall sword would allow, Arthur Lord Grey Baron of Wilton, then Deputie of Ireland, halted to Dingle, and so to Del-Ore, where he had them to fo sharpe a banquet that all the Spaniards, Italians, and Portugals, notwithstanding their bragging brauadoes pickled their weapons at the first brunt, and vpon the points of the aduersaries died without mercy, the Capaines, Coronell, Secretary and few more referred for ransom. The Fort they had stored with money, Bisket, Bacon, Oile and wine, sufficient to hold out the space of sixe moneths, and furnished with powder, shot, and armour sufficiently for two thousand men: with them all the Irish as well women as men died; and Desmond driven into extreme want, fearing the prick of every thorne, and the shadow of every bulle, notwithstanding he was armed with an Agas Dye, and an enchanted ring lent from the Popes owne finger hung about his necke, yet could hee not keepe his traiterous head vpon his shoulders; when like a wolfe wandering in the woods for his pray, was in a poore Cottage wounded by a souldier rushing in vpon him, and being knowne was presently cut thorow by the head. But with his ende, ended not the troubles of Ireland, especially those parts of Ffiffler, that lay most remote from England.

(149) And whereunto, Walter Earle of Essex, accompanied with the Lord Rich, and others, had formerly made an expedition, shew to reduce those wilde Irish vnto a more ciuill life and respectiue obedience vnto the English Crowne, as to wisme them to the knowledge of Christ, whom they most ignorantly worshipped. But the death of this Noble man hapning before his inendments could bee accomplished, left that to be followed by others which himselfe had begun.

(150) The troubles of which Province we haue partly touched vnto the death of Shaw O-Neale, whose legonies by Parliament were inducted into the Queenes hands, and a Law enacted, that from thenceforth no man should assume the name or title of O-Neale. After which some small flakes of peace breathed vpon those parts; till shortly Turlough Leinigh, a brothers son of Cow-More the Grandfather of this Shaw, by a popular election tooke that stile vpon him, a man steeped farre in yeeres which made him more quiet, and much the rather for feare of Shaw O-Neale loones, but especially of Hugh Earle of Downe whom the sonne of Balthard Mathew, vnto whom he had given his daughter in Marriage, and the said Baron had lately repudiated and cast off.

(151) This Turlough was most obsequious and seruicable to Queene Elizabeth, stirring no troubles to the English, though to his neighbours the Irish he procured most sterne: For, O-Donnell hee disquieted, hee sent of the Hande he molested, and in an encounter slew Alexander Ogethe the slayer of Shaw O-Neale, and indeed became so fearefull, that his soone in law Flugh, lay hid from him in his owne Countrey, and lastly escaped his hand into England; where to raise himselfe from his obscure estate and condition hee got comend of a troupe of Horse, with a pension of a thousand markes by yeere from the Queene. Whose seruice against the Rebellious Desmond, was so well performed and accepted, that he obtained the place and title of Earle of Tir-Ore, pleading the Letters patent of King Henry the eight granted to his Grandfather, and his heires males, whereof himselfe was the soone of Mathew created Baron of Downe by the same King. Thus growne vnto greatness, old Turlough vpon certaine conditions conditions resigned vnto him the Government of Fisher where shortly cōbining himselfe with the men of most might, they together associated their strength to defend the Romish religion, for that was the mantle that euer covered their hatched rebellions.

(152) The first Champion that founded the Altum was Mac-Guyre a man of a turbulent spirit, thrust forward by Garraus a Priest, whom Pope Pius the second had ordained Primate of Ireland, commanding him in the name of God to fight there the Lords Bataile, affuring him by his Apostolicall warrant, of most fortunate proceedings and happy successe. But few how this great Prophet was deceived; for by the valour of S^r. Richard Bingham, Mac-Guyre was discomfited, and the primate Priest slaine in the field.

(153) The Confederacy thus broken, Mac-Guyre let himselfe for open rebellion; whom Tyrone in shew of his dutifull obedience perswaded, and was so forward in seruice, that hee receiued a wound in his thigh to his no little honour. Whereupon he became of greater respect in the English Court, and more enhanced in his owne esteem; so that hee feared not to exhibit Complaints against the Lord Deputy S^r. William Fitz-William, the Marshall whose sister hee had married, and the Garrison soldiers that garded those parts. But the Deputy recalled, and S^r. William Russell appointed in his place, as if all quarrels had bene quite forgotten, he came vnto the new Lord Deputy, and exhibited an humble submission vpon his knees, wherein hee dolefully expressed his inward griefe, in that her Maiesty had conceived some indignation against him. His affirming himselfe from the State, he confessed was disagreeable to his obedience, albeit to be somewhat excused by the hard measure (as he alleged) of the late Deputy, and Marshall that were combined for his destruction. Hee acknowledged that the Queene Maiesty had advanced him in title, dignity and great liuing, and himselfe unworthy of any, but rather dishonour and ruine, if he should become vngratefull vnto so good a Prince. With these and the like complement of his true heart and meaning, hee posseth the Councill of Ireland, that albeit S^r. Henry Bagnall the Marshall was present, and charged him with many subornations of Mac-Guyre, the Primate, the beldice of Sir-Felton and others, hee was by them dismissed and sent home, to the great discontent of the Queene and disquietnesse of the Land, as afterward followed, and in course of time and story shall be declared.

(154) Long before these last Irish troubles, (as you may obserue in the relation of some former attempts against the Queene) the brands of dissension were blowne vnto flames, betwixt Queen Elizabeth of England and Philip the second of that name King of Spain; whose first breaking-furth was in the Netherlander cause, the one persecuting, and the other defending the religion that those people profess; and thus it began in the yeere of Grace, 1575. Don Lewis, gouernor of those Low Countries for the said King, sent his Agent vnto Queen Elizabeth, desiring her to banish such of them as repaired to England, only their flight, and their religion all the cause alleged against them.

(155) Her answer was short and nothing acceptable, that she held it unworthy the Maiesty of a Prince to chase away those poore exiled and scattered Netherlanders, that were fled into her Dominions, for the safety of their liues, and to auoid the Spanish tyranny, exercised only in case of their consciences. And yet the forbade some men of speciall note, as also such as bare Armes, to enter England, vpon condition that Westmerland should be banished the Low Countries with such other Rebels as had fled to the Spaniard. But the Clergy intending to bring their Spanish Inquisition into those parts, the Prince of Orange entered conference with the States of Holland and Zeland, touching the defence of their professed religion, and the preferuation of their distressed Countrey, vnable of themselves (as was alleged) long to defend themselves, and therefore it was thought fittest to choole them a Protector.

(156) This passing for current among the Councillors of estate, there were in name, the Emperor, the French King, and the Queen of England; for they were past all hope of any assistance with Spain. Yet of these in choise, some excepted against, as neither life nor conuenient to be yeilded vnto. Against the Empire was alleged the diuinities of religion, the small vnion of those Germane Princes, and hauing their hands full to keepe their owne at home, would bee the lesse able to alid with helpe abroad. The French (they feared) had waiked their money the onely means for warre; with their owne ciuill dissensions; if not, yet might they hardly be trusted, as witnessed the cruell massacre lately committed. England then was the Pillar to which they must leane; yet the Queene the greater of all Christian Princes, their Nany the Commandresse of the Seas, and their people professing the same Religion with them, the farest band of Christian society; further it was alleged that the Realme of Denmarke and Sweden desired it, the Countie of Friesland and the Hanse Townes in the East intreated for it, Brabant and Flanders sought it; yea and the rightfull Title of the Princes Elizabeth issued from the Earles of Holland and Zeland by the Lady Philip, daughter to William the third of that name, Earle of Holland and Holland, did warrant it.

(157) Thus then concluded, the States were sent vnto England, and made the end of their coming knowne to the Queen; who wisely weighing into what a Labirinth they should enter, fought rather the safety of her owne, then to consent to their motion; for Spain they well knew would storme at the Vnion, and France bee in great iacobin to haue such a neighbour; shee therefore promising to be a mediator vnto the King of Spain for their peace, and after some complements of Princely entertainments with thanks for their offer, and sufferance to carry with them many voluntary English souldiers, let them depart: whose deuall made knowne, was nothing welcome to those distressed Provinces.

(158) Long after this, Lewis the Gouernor liued not, whom Don Iohn of Austria (his brother to King Philip) succeeded; who at first made shew of most fauourable affection, yet as vrging their subiection to Spain; and obedience to the Apostolicall See of Rome. Neither would hee come to their Councill, without hostages deliuered, and most of their troups to guard his suspending person, esteeming them Libertines and Hereticks, in whom was no trust.

(159) These mooued the States once more to sue vnto her Maiesty, that by her meanes, with peace they might enioy the ancient Priuiledges of their Provinces, and the freedom of their own consciences against the Inquisition and Tyranny of Spain; and indeed so lamentably deplored their case, that the pity-full Queen sent into Spain, to desire the King in commiseration to withdrawe these excrements from the distressed. But Philip desce on that care, and Iohn planting his Garrison with suspicious intents, Elizabeth began to looke to the maine, sending the King word, shee liked not that his Souldiers should bee her bad neighbours, and the Gouernor notice that she would not suffer the Christian Netherlanders to be tyrannized by his Spaniards. And thereupon caused the value of forty thousand Angell in Bullion, vnminted (in part of an hundred thousand pound sterling promised) to be sent vnto Brussels, preciecing the States obligations for the same; where also were confirmed certaine conditions betwixt her and them.

(160) This moued Don Iohn to such conceits, that he intended to doe wonders in England, by interterposing himself in the Scottish affairs, yea, and by the distraction of Queen Elizabeth, whereto hee is said to have got the Pope's good furtherance. But whether by poison or discounts this great conceited Monarch left the Crowne of England where it gloriously stood, and laid his owne head in the grave of death.

(161) And indeed so glorious was Elizabeth fame, grown now more potent by the Low Countries engagements, that the wife Semites of France, leered their owne Starre would be dimmed at the presence of her bright Sonne. For Henry their King, though he made great shewes to doe much, both in the Church and Councill of State; in feasts, in masks, and in treading the measures of dances, dallied out both day and night in vnumerable delights: And yet the Clergy to hold in their owne hands the raines of Church-government, with Bels, Bookes, and Beads, founded forth the trale of his religious piety in the cares of their auditories: And to manage all temporal affairs at their owne dispose, the Rosen Archer, and the Guine laide lookt the bridle in his owne necke, notwithstanding his pleasures with their greater advices. But lest the English maiden Queen should bee a male to the Churchmen's Mullings, or disturb these State-guiders by claime (as she had done) of her owne right in France; the marriage motioned nine yeeres before, betwixt their Kings brother Francis Valois Duke of Anjou, and Elizabeth England's faire Queen, was againe solicited in hope by this match to make her wholly theirs, the better to establish their peace: & to effectually was the fate mooved, and so acceptably heard of her Maiesty, that the Manservant came ouer to perlon to wooe her himselfe: though to the little liking of many Nobles, and great discontent to the Commons, as (amongst other appearances) was made knowne by a booke written against it, for which (by reason of some personal and over-lustful passages) the Laditor lost his hand. But whether her Maiesty affected not marriage, or disliked the man, or else out of her tender care not to give the least griefe, or distaste to her Subjects, after most Princely and magnificient entertainment ther let him depart without any promise of a nuptiall knot.

(162) The fame of this Duke was very renowned, and much the more by the English Queens favours; in so much, that the distressed vnted Provinces, after they had declared Philip of Austria (then King of Spain) by his too violent Government against their priviledges (wherunto hee had sworn) to be an enemy unto their state and peace, and therefore vpon breach of covenants to have fallen from his interst among them, chose this hopefull Manservant to bee their Protector, as a Prince most powerful to defend their cause; of whose triumphs and French treacheries there, let Serres and Peris report for me.

(193) He dying in France penitent and sorrowfull for what hee had done; and William of Nassau Prince of Orange (by an Edict from Spain proclaimed a Traitor, his Lands and goods given to them that could bring him either dead or alive, with a further reward of twenty five thousand Crowns annuall) was first dangerously wounded in the face with a Pistol, and at last murthered with the like shot by the base hand of an odious traitor at his Court in Delft in Holland: whereupon the oppressed Provinces once more fied for reliefe, both to her Majesty of England, as also unto Henry the French King.

(164) Shee much disliking the cruelties of Spain, whose hands were thus dippd in the blood of this Prince, commended their cause unto King Henry by an honorable Ambassage. But hee, finding himselfe overmattered at home, and in danger of the Guise and the league; himselfe without forces, and theirs grown very strong; recommended their distressed unto Queen Elizabeth by his owne Ambassadors, promising her by the faith of a King, assistance for those Netherlanders reliefe: and the like requestt bee made unto the King of Namur in their behalfe. Hereupon their Procurators were sent into England, with full Commission to dispose of their Provinces at the Queens pleasure.

(165) Her Councell then assembled to confesse of the business, many waighy considerations amongst them were mooved, and lastly concluded, that her Maiesty ought to accept of the offer. The defence of Gad Gysel was the first motive the being the nursing mother of Christ's distressed Saines: The Spaniards Inquisition, that without respect had persecuted her Subjects contrary to right, was too cruell to be tolerated: Philip's Army with flying colours sent lately into Ireland vpon gift made vnto him by the Pope, with a purpose of the like enterprise for England, betwixt their intents; and lastly the hard measure that was to bee expected for England, if the Spaniards located in these neere Netherland Provinces was to be prevented. These important reasons for her owne State, and pity of theirs, mooved her Maiesty to become their Defender, but would in no wise take the Title of Soveraigne Lady thereof, which they would have conferred vpon Her and her heires.

(166) And thereupon Articles being drawne, (to the number of thirty) Sir John Norrie (a renowned Marshall man) was appointed General of five thousand foote, and a thousand Horsemen English, all retained at her Maiesties pay during the said warres, which monthly amounted to twelve thousand five hundred, twenty five pound sterling, accounting 56. dayes to the month, according to the Contract. For which monies hee disbursed, the Townes of Flushing and Breda, with two Schooners, and the Casle of Ramshorn in Holland, were delivered to her Maiesties vie in pledge, vntill the money were repaid: these Covenantes were dated at 27. of such the tenth of August in Anno 1585.

(167) This Protection, vnderaken by the Queen of England, was very ill taken by King Philip of Spain; neither better digested by the Pope his holy Father, as was shewed in two hung libels published against her: where amongst other things, there was taxed with Ingratitude towards King Philip, who in the raigne of her sister, was said to have faued her life, and that treacherously hee had sought the death of the Prince of Fernando the present Governour in those parts vnder the said King: vnto which impudent slanders hee made answer in a booke printed both in English and French, shewing the shameful vntaith of those impolituous liars, and the reasons that led her to assist those poore distressed States, whereof these were a part.

(168) The natural situation of those Countries, lying directly opposite to England; the neerenesse, commodious haens, and commerce of these people with the English, euen when they were feirall, and not yet vnted together, as of late yeeres they have beene, by inter-marriages, and reduced vnder the Governments of the Lords that succeeded in the Dukedome of Burgundy, betwixt whom and the English Kings, hath beene a continual league, as also betwixt the natural Subjects of both Countries, both of commerce for Merchants, as all other speciall bonds of morall amity. For testimony of which, there are extant sundry Authentick treaties and transactions for mutual commerce, intercourse and frative amity of ancient times; as betwixt King Henry the sixth, and Philip the Second Duke of Burgundy; which was renewed by Duke Charles his sonne (Father to the King of Spaines Grand-mother, and husband to the Lady Margaret, sister to King Edward the fourth) and againe confirmed by King Henry the seventh and the Arch-Duke Philip, Grand-father to the King of Spain. And of later yeeres betwixt King Henry the eight, and Charles the fifth, Emperour of Almane, Father to Philip now

King of Spain. In all which treaties it was at all times specially contained in expresse words, that the naturall people and Subjects of either side should have mutual fauours and duties one to the other. But now Philip of Spain departing the Low-Countries, and appointing Spaniards, Forreiners and Strangers, men exercised in warre, and delighted in blood to bee chiefe Governours of all the said Low-Countries, contrary to their ancient lawes & customes, who upon ambition, and for primate-lure base violently broke the Liberties, as the people calledenge, and in a tyrannous sort haue banished, killed and destroyed within the space of a few monethes many of the most ancient and principall persons, of the naturall Nobility, haue brought in intestine warres, made the Country in a manner desolate by famine, sword, and other exactions. So that the people are forced for the safety of their lines to seek the protection of other forraine Lords, or rather to yeeld themselves wholly to the souerainetie of some mighty Monarch, as not onely by the ancient lawes of these Countries they may, but even by speciall priuileiges granted to the people by some of the Lords and Dukes of the Provinces as they doe affirme, whereby they are free from their former homages, and at liberty to make choise of any other to bee their Prince and head.

(169) Besides these reasons concerning them, the practises of Bernard de Mendoza (Liege Ambassador in England for Philip King of Spain) who by the direction of Francis I began to contriue to bring in a forraine power to the destruction of England: elate, it was not onely helde a worke of piety to defend these distressed Christians, but also a necessary policy to mende the Low-Countries Protestants with England supply the better to impace these dangerous allies. And how ioyous her protection was to these Provinces, the delivery of Flushing into the Castell of Rammstein vnto Sir Philip Sidney, and the Brill vnto Sir Thomas Cressly, appointed by her Maiesty the Governours thereof, is witnessed by the letters of Prince Maurice himself, wherein hee signified the great ioy and hopes that he conceived, and his willing surrender of the same towne Flushing, being his patrimoniall inheritance.

(170) Things ordered thus among these great Potentates, Robert Dudley Baron of Deuonshire was the man, whom the Queene appointed to bee her Deputy General, honourable by birth, being the Duke of Northumberland sonne, by creation Earle of Leicester, and of the Order of the Garter, gracious in the eye of his Soueraigne, and sufficient fortified with all courtly complements, who being accompanied with a gallant traine of Earles, Barons, and other great Personages of England, landed in Zealand the nineteenth of December, and thence was honourably conuained vnto Dambrige in Holland, where hee was entailed, and the States took their oath to the Queene, which no sooner was accomplished, but that a insurrection began to arise, vpon this occasion.

(171) The States having drawne instructions of Counsell for their Countreys affaires, presented the same to their new made Goernour, whose answer was, that such instructions would proue limitations, which his authority now being absolute, could no wayes indure: they greatly mistrufling wherewith hee did aime, bewailed the miseries wherewith their Country seemed to bee brought, and suffered him to choole his Counsellors of Estate, and to stamp his owne Armes both in their great and Countreys-Seale: which when the Queene their sister vnderstoode, shee was offended both with them and him, supposing her selfe to bee drawne further then euer thereintended, or that hee had yeelded vnto in the Declaration, where hee selfe had granted to bee their Admiral, but neuer would grant to bee the Soueraigne of those Countries.

(172) Things thus passing betwixt England and the United Provinces, the English Merchants, Ships and goods were arrested in Spain, which caused many to leaue the trade of Marchandizing, and to become men of Warre on the Seas, where alwayes the Spaniard, who forer wanne, went to the work. But on the land, the Prince of Parma held Pisa, for whose further safety Pope Sixtus the fifth sent him a consecrated sword with a harte, and to his men of Warre the Apostolical blessing, with eternall life for them that should die in the Catholike Romish faith.

(173) Another feare was blowne into the Netherlands eares, which feare troubled them, though without all cause; for it was divulged by sinister reports, that Queen Elizabeth meant to make peace with the King of Spain, without either mention or regard for the safety of her vnted Confinement. Shee touched in honour, wherof there was euer iaculous, wrote her letters to Prince Parma in answer of his, that had mentioned the same, and to these doubtfull Netherlands, to assure them the contrary, both which were dated from Buchemond vpon one and the same day.

(174) Now Leicester not liking to lie still, and doe nothing, made his preparation for Zurphem, which being in want of victuals, the Prince of Parma fought to supply, to intercept which, Sir John Norre was sent, and to the same seruice came the Earle of Essex, the Lord Willoughby, Sir Philip Sydney, Sir William Stanley, and Sir William Russell, to all two hundred horse, and sixtine hundred Musketeers and Pikes: the Parma having seauen hundred horse, and two thousand foot, appointed with the like defence.

(175) The day being darke through great foggy mists, the Spaniard which their Vigils made forward, layed in a place of advantage neere vnto Zurphem, vpon whom the English were entred before they were aware, and were entertained with a furious charge of shot, which notwithstanding they abode, and so valiantly followed the skirmish, that they ouerthrew a corner of horse, and took Cressly the Captaine thereof prisoner, and after him Count Hammill Guncage, another Count also they put backe and flew. But in this day was made vnfornate, that the worthy Sir Philip Sydney as hee changed his horse, was shot by a Musket about the left knee, which so thinned the thigh-bone, that the Bullet could not bee recovered, of which wound hee died five and twenty dayes after, to the no little griefe of her Maiesty and many others, for the great hopes they had of that worthy Gentleman; in whom were compleat all vertues and valours that could bee required or residing in man.

(176) Good seruice done vpon the Scones neere Zurphem, so that the Towne seemed to be blocked vp; his Excellency (so did they now entitle the Earle) made Arundell Turle the Governour thereof, and ouer Designer Sir William Stanley, to the great discontent of the Estates, for that Turke had bene a double Traitor in seruice, and Stanley before siue had serued the Spaniard. Other grieuances also they then began to complain of, and by Petition to his Excellency sought the redress, but hee minding for England, with faire words held them in expectance vntill such time as hee should reture againe.

(177) The State-Souldiers found themselves agreed, that they were not dealt with according to custome, degrees or desert, (as that the Sergeant should be aduanced to be Ensigne, the Ensigne Sergeant Maier, and so vpward) they venturing their liues to winne reputation. And the Earle of Arundell held himselfe much wronged, in that Sir Arundell Norre vpon words spoken at Table, sent him a letter of challenge to fight with him body to body, the Earle then lying sick of a wound receiued at Zurphem, which hee did dauidally take, as being his vanequall and partly imputed it to the sufferance of his Excellency. But more neerly touched the losse of Droner and Seaver at Zutphen, traitorously folde into the Spaniards by Sir William Stanley, and Rowland Yorke Englishmen, whom Levesley had left there at his departure. These things droue the Councill of State into many calouities, that the English endured as the French had done.

(178) The occasion that moued the Lord Generall to return into England, was for his presence in Parliament, wherein was handled the waythey cause of that great Princesse Mary Queene of Scotland, whose vtumelic death and vnfortune ended was finished at Wetheringby Caille in the County of Northampton, to the great dishonour of her Maieity, as was manifestly scene * to all her people, by the griefe shee conceiued, and high displeasure shee tooke against the forward * Actor, both in calling him into the Tower of London, and neuer admitting him after into her presence, or his place. The bodie of the deplord Queene was solemnly interred in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, where it yet remaineth vnder a hearle of blacke velvet.

(179) In this absence of Levesley euery fereall Captain tooke vpon him the place of a Generall whereby many desperate seruices were attempted, and great Robbery by their Souldiers committed, so that it was feared all would come to ruine. To prevent which, a Councill for State was assembled at Dunbar, where Maurice Nassau, the younger sonne of William Prince of Orange was elected their Governor, and the Prouinces sworn vnto him, with a refection had vnto her Maieity; when also a great complaint was sent into England, which to examine, the Lord Buckhurst was sent into Holland; at whose doings Levesley tooke offence, but especially against Sir John Noris, that renowned Leader whom to the great dislike of the States, hee caused to bee recalled, and sent into Ireland.

(180) Levesley the Lord Generall hoping to recover his wel high lost reputation, landed in Zeland, gallantly accompanied, where hee made a forward shew of great seruicy, but such was the successe, that sluer was surrendered, and the occasion thereof partly imputed to him; when also begonne many tedious abettings betwixt the Estates and his Excellency, so that some Townes vtely rected his gouernment, and hee againe sought to seize vpon some other.

(181) The care of preventing further mischiefs, moued her Maieity hereupon to recall the Earle of Levesley into England, well knowing that a Kingdom diuided could not long stand: who on his returne, shee commanded to reigne his gouernment of the Netherlanders into the hands of the Generall Estates, which was performed by assigneing vnder his hand, and sent vnto them: which resignation receiued, was perfectly proclaimed through all the Prouinces, to the end that euery man might know him selfe discharged of his oath to the Earle of Levesley.

(182) Now Philip King of Spaine clyping these diffinitions, thought it his true advantage for him to worke vpon, hauing a long time projected an attempt for England, and at that time preparing a mighty Naue vnto the sea. To call therefore a mill ouer her Maieities eyes, and to driue all calouities out of her head, hee importuned by all meanes the Realmes vnto peace. Shee measuring other princes by her owne true meaning and peacefull dispositions, gaue care to his guilefull lullaby without suspicion of any snake to be hid in so floury a garden; and therefore sent to the Estates to vnderstand their resolution for a vtumelic peace, protesting that if they stood out, shee would withdraw her whole forces from thence.

(183) They, like themselves answered with a bold deniall, neither thought they that shee could haue any peace with him that was head of the holly League, and persecuted the exercise of the reformed

Religion, whose policy (as they feared) was but to detraet time, till his sea prouisions were better repared, as indeed the sequell soon proued, the terror of this prepared, and Invincible Naue (as the Spaniards termed it) spreading it selfe wide, and menacing fearful stormes both vnto the English and Flemish; in somuch that the Estates like prouident respecters of themselves, and thankfull men to their Proceedresse, prepared their shippes of warr to affilit her Maieity, and preffed a thousand sailers of the Netherlanders for her seruice on sea.

(184) During this brate of the Spanish proceedings, Commissioners were sent out of England to counterposon conditions of the pretended peace with the Duke Parma, Lieutenant for the King of Spaine, who for that purpose came to Offend. For her Maieity were assigned Henry Earle of Derby, William Lord Cobham Warden of the Cinque-ports, with Sir James Croft and others. For King Philip were Maximilian Earle of Arenberg, Governour of Antwerp, Messieur Richard President of Artois, and Councillor of State, besides other Ciuilians. These stayed at Bruges, and by messagers too and fro much time was spent for precedence of place, where they should meet, and what hostages should be giuen for security of sides; yet lastly, the English had the priority, and the place was Offend.

(185) The demand of the Queene was, to haue a farcase of Armes, with a pccent and vndeelayed truce, mistrusting the Kinges preparation at Sea; the sending away of forraigne Souldiers out of the Low-Countries for England safety, a restitution of such summes of money as the Queen had leaue vnto the Estates, which the King had promised by his Edict made at Brussels, that the Netherlanders might enioy their antient liberties and priuiledges, nor bee gouerned by a stranger, but by a Native Prince; that the Religion might bee permitted for two yeeres at least, and lastly, that the Articles of Pacification of Gent, and other like Treaties might bee obliterated: and these being concluded, the Townes shce possided should bee deliuered vpon such reasonable conditions, as all the world should witness hee tooke them not to her owne vic, or commodity, but onely vpon a necessary defence and assistance.

(186) To these the Spaniards replied, that touching their preparation for Sea, they did assure them it nothing concerned England, to lend away their Souldiers, their King could not refuse, vntill that the Netherlanders had submitted themselves vnto him; concerning their priuiledges, it appertained nothing to the Queene, neither should shee prescribe to the King a law, and so farre was hee from tolerating Religion, that hee would not heare thereof, otherwise then hee had allowed vnto other Towns that had submitted vnto his obedience; and the like answer made they for the pacification of Gent.

(187) The propolitions further urged, and answered with dilatorie delays, Pope Sixtus the fourth (who being prime in the intended Tragedy) obseruing well the time among other beafts lent forth his Bull to thunder out bolts against England Queene, confirming the Excommunications of his two predecessors, and depraying her Maieity from all precedence dignity, for whose small dispossession, hee then ordained his Catholike sonne Philip of Spaine, commanding all her Subjects, vpon paine of his curse, (oh fearful bugge-bear) to aid and assist the great, noble, and Invincible Armes, prepared to that end vnder the command of the Duke of Parma. And Alles an Englishman, an eager Trompeter to this exploit, now purposely made Cardinall by the Pope (to shew his Holiness affection to the English Nation) would not lie idle, but set him selfe on work to write a Booke exhortatory to the Nobilitie of England and Ireland, to rouse them vp to the execution of the Popes sentence against their Soueraign, in affiling K. Philip, who was made the whip in his Holineffe hand, & the Duke of Parma appointed the chiefe Commander in that action, which Booke (fraught with all impudency of diabolish flanders against her sacred person) was printed at Antwerp in 1586.

(183) This Bull and Booke coming to the Queene's knowledge, the first vnto Parma (who had gained the reputation of some Princely vertues) to deale plainly with her; if so, then meant she no longer to continue the treaty of peace: but he with many Court-like complements denied his authority, neither had leue (as he said) any such precripts. Moreover the English Commissioners pressed the conditions, purposely to finde some footheps of this close-carried designe, when at last it burst forth in these termes, that the King of Spain had kept fifty thousand men in pay almost a whole yeere to be fill and doe nothing; so his great charge by the means of that treaty. At which very instant, these their hidden traps and toyles apparantly shewed themselves, when the Seas were turrted with such a Nauy of ships; as her swelling waues could hardly be seene, and the Flagges, Streamers, and Ensignes, so spread in the winde, that they seemed to darken euen the Sunne, which put the English Commissioners in some suspition and feare, having no hostages for their safe returne.

(189) This Inuisible Nauy long in preparing, and now in a readinesse, was furnished with all ppositions of warres, and with many brauadoes spread their talles for England's inuasion, guided by the Princiall Generall, whose names, the numbers of Vessels, Ordinances, Sailers, Souldiers, and Slaves, as I finde them recorded, in this ensuing Table are inserted.

(190) Admirable (as yet see) was the provision of this mighty Armado, and so confident was the Spaniard that England should pay the whole thor, that no cost of any thing was at all spared; of bullets for great shot were two hundred and twenty thousand; of powder foure thousand and two hundred kintals, every kintall containing a hundred weight; of lead for bullets one thousand kintals; and one thousand and two hundred kintals of match; seven thousand muskets and callicers; tenne thousand partizans and halberts; with murdering peeces, double Canons, and field peeces for campe; with store of furniture for carriages, Males and Horses, so that they were sufficiently prouided both for sea and land. Bread and histket was baked and wine laide aboard for sixe monthes provision; sixe thousand and five hundred kintals of bacon; three thousand of cheefe, besides flesh, rice, beanes, pease, oyle and vinegar, with twelue thousand pipes of fresh water, store they had of torches, lanthornes, and lampes, canoes, hides and lead to stop leakes, whips, and butcherly knives; for what vfe we may imagine. In a word by the report of Don Diego Pimentell, the army was two and thirty thousand strong and coild the King of Spain thirty thousand daies every day.

(191) In this army were five regiments of old Spanish souldiers, of the Parties, of Naples, Sicily, and the Terceras, commanded by five Masters De Campo; the first was Don Diego de Pimentel a Knight of the order of St. Iohn, brother to the Marquisse of Tanceras, and cousin to the Earle of Brancourt and Calot; the second Colonel was Don Frances de Toledo brother to the Earle of Orgas; the third, Don Alonso de Lucan; the fourth Don Nicholas de Isla or Parriso Anselmo; and the fifth was Augustin Mexia brother to the Marquisse de la Guarda who was afterwards made Gouvernour of Antwerp; each company having in his regiment two and thirty companies, besides the Castilians and Portugall bands, each of them having their peculiar gouerners, captaines, officers, colours and weapons.

(192) The General of this mighty army was Don Lohaniem Perez, Duke of Medina Sidonia, Barne of Saint Lucas, of the Order of the Goldt Fleece. The Admirall was Don John Martineze de Ribahad, the Marshall Don Francesc Bonabille; and the chiefe Counsellors for the warre were Diego Pimentell, Floris de Valdez, Pedro de Valdez, Michela de Oquendo, Don Alonso de Lucan, Don Diego Maldonado, and Don Gerogio Martineze. Don Martin Alencan was ordained Vicar General for the holy Inquisition, in whose traine were a hundred Monks and Iesuits; and Cardinal Allen was appointed the Superintendent of all Ecclesiasticall matters throughout England; who fearing to bee overtaken with time, translated Pope Sixtus his Bull into English, that it might bee the sooner published upon the arrival of the Spanish Fleet into that Kingdome. The Duke of paration.

(193) Neither was the Duke of Parma slacke in the business, yet lying in readiness to ioyne his forces with this Naue, let many thousands on work to build ships, to digge and deepen rivers for faile from Antwerp to Gant, and to Bruges, lading three hundred small boates with munition and victuals; as also prepared fiftie other flat bottoome, every one able to beare thirty hories for transportation, with Bridges ready made to shippe and vnschippe them. Two hundred more were made of the like fashion, though not so bigge, and lay ready in the Haue of Newport; at Dunkirk lay thirtie fower shippes of warre, wherein store of pyles were belloved, thrustened at the end with yron pykes, to pile vp the mouths of rivers; and at Graveling hee had provided twenty thousand empty Casks, with Cords and other furniture fitt to make floating Bridges to shippe vp the Haue. He likewise had shipped great abundance of Saddles, Bridles, with all other furniture for hories; and hories also for carriage, with Ordnance, and other provisions of warre.

(194) Neere vnto Newport hee had lying vnder the command of Camille, thirty Companies of Italians, two of Wallons, and eight of Burguinois, every Company being an hundred men. At Dynem he mulctured four score Companies of Netherlanders, thre score of Spaniards, thre score of high Dutch, and fower of rebellious fugitiue English, whereof Sir William Stanley was General; at Carvick also were fower thousand lodged, and at Waters nine hundred hories, ouer whom the Marquisse of Gault was Commander. And to this Land-seruice came the Duke of Palmaria, supposed to be the Spanish King's brother; the Marquisse of Bourgon, one of the Archduke Ferdinands sonnes, Don Feliciano Consequia of the house of Montana, a great Soldier, who had bene Viceroy of Spain, Don Iohn de Medusa Bailard of Florence, Don Amador bailard of Savoy, with many others of the like estate.

(195) Neither must you think that Sixtus Quintus the Pope of Rome, did in any wise neglect his diligence and deuotion to this intended invasion; whose helping hand was shewed in sending forth his Crasada (as hath bene vied against the Turkes) and publishing a safe passport for his Philippins to enter into England. Who also for the furtherance of the enterprise, undertooke to contribute a million of gold, the halfe presently, and the other when any notable Haue in that land should bee wonne; with this promise notwithstanding (most wisely inferred) that he should hold the English Crowne as feudatorie vnto the See of Rome; in earnest whereof, hee bestowed vpon him his Apostolicall benediction, and the Title of the Defender of the Faith, so liberall was hee, both in his temporall and spiritual largesse; and so forward was Philip to catch at Elizabeth still flourishing Crowne: but her vndamend heart in this present danger, as another Ezechiah, fought vnto the Lord, whose annointed seruant there was, and who euer had bene her owne defendand. And for presecuting those long threatend stormes, the late Charles Howard Lord Baron of Effingham, high Admirall of England, vnto the seas, where the Lord Henry Seymour kept betwix Calis and Dover, seconded by the Ships of the vniuers Provinces, in league with the Queene.

(196) The French King who euer honoured & admired Queen Elizabeth great and gracious vertues, having more particular intelligences that this great preparation was made against England, gave speedy & secret notice thereto to her Maesty, whereupon hee commanded the general forces of the Realme in their severall shires to bee mustred, trained, and put in readiness for the defence of the whole; which accordingly was done, and whereof the Lord Robert Dudley Earle of Leicester, and Steward of her Household was appointed Lieutenant. Tilbury in Essex was the place for the Campe, whereunto were appointed 1500. horiesmen; and twenty two thousand of foot, and to guard her Maities person, out of the severall Counties of the West, East, and South parts of England, were selected two thousand three hundred, fifty two horiesmen, and thirty foure thousand and fifty of foot, her selfe in courage faire surmounting her sex, as another Zenobia, or rather Deborah, lead forth the Lordes host against this great Sisera, and her foildiers valiant for warre, and apt for battell, men skilfull to handle speare and shield, both for courage and quicke dispatch, might well be compared vnto those Gadites that came to aide David, whose faces were like to the faces of Lions, and were compared to Roes in the mountains for swiftness.

(197) The Inimicible Manie, and terror of Europe, as the Papals both termed, and took it to bee, having all things prepared, loosed Anchor from Lisbon vpon the nineteenth of May, and made vnto the Groine in Gallicia, it being the nextest Haue to England, whence hoysing bayles with great hope and pride, bent their courie thitherward; his suddenly the heavens hating such hostile actions, powdered downe reuenge, by a sore and unexpected tempest, which droue the Duke of Medina, the chiefe General backe againe into the Graine, eight other of their shippes being disperied on seas, their masts broken and blowne over-board; besides three Portingall Gallies which fell vpon the Coast of Spain in France, and were serpyon by their owne fluzes, whereof David Grayn an Englishman was the full, who with his fellows both French and Turks freed themselves by the slaughter of many Spaniards, among whom Don Diego de Aluarez was one.

His Prince's brother Vice-Admirall
of the English.

(198) Charles Howard Lord Admirall heiring for certain that their Fleet was ready to hoist vp their sailes, had sent the worthy Sir Francis Drake, who was constituted his Vice-Admirall, vnto the West parts, with fifty six shippes well appointed, whither himselfe also following with speed, and ioyning his Fleet, their number amounted to one hundred shippes, whereof fiftene were Fluallants, and nine Voluntaries of Denishire Gentlemen; many a seruicable man returning backe for lacke of employment or place. These from Phynoth refolowing and affaying to put forth to seas, were so met with the wind, that past the Syller they could not attain, and thence also were forced by reuempt into the Haue, from whence they lanchd to refresh their ships and companies; where lying at Anker, the Scouts at Sea had decried some sayles of the Spaniards, which had bene likewise distressed by the storme, but before they could bee hailed, the wind came about, and brought them to the Graine, where the rest lay in harbour.

June 6.

(199) Intelligence spreading that the Spaniards were in want; their great shippes disperied, the rest shume-shaken, and their men by multitudes slaine with the plague; the Lord Admirall meant to vie the advantage vpon the first North wind, which came about the eight day of Iuly, and bare his layle almost within sight of Spain, when suddenly it changing into the South; and he wilely foreseeing, that the enemy might passe without his discouerie, that the Seas might bee stormy, and his Fleet wind-bound, and that whilst they thus lay abroad, their cruike much better might be employed at home, hee therefore presently returned, and anchored his Fleet in the Haven of Plymouth, suffering his men to relieue themselves on land.

(200) But the Spaniards ships new rigged, and their wares supplied, their King still hore on his former resolutions, instantly vrged and haleden his Chalcetaines to port againe to Sea, which accordingly was done vpon the eleuenth of Iuly, waving their Anker at the Groat, where with brunt shows and fullsails they came into the Chancels of the narrow Seas, where they cast anker, and dispatched certaine small pinnasses vnto the Duke of Parma, to signifie their arrivall and readines, and to command him in the name of the King to forward his charge forthw'th cruike.

(201) The English Fleet being in harbour, and many men on shore, Captain Thomas Fleming (some say a Pirate) did strike the Spaniard vpon the point of the Leopard, the wind being then South and by West. He halting to Plymouth, made relation thereof vnto the Lord Admirall, the newes was more fearefull, for that it was sodaine, the Queene having received intelligence for certaine, that this great Armada would nor come forth that yeere, their bulkes being lo dispersed and bruised, and their wares and sicknesse lo great, vpon which rash reports (a dangerous matter in State-affaires, no confident he was, that hee lent for foure of her tallest royall shippes, to bee brought againe vnto Chatham) but Fleming vnexpected discovery hindred that purpose, and all bands were set on work to warpe out the Shippes, the winde blowing harde, and hindering the same.

(202) The next day about noone, this terrible Fleet was decryed by the English, who with a South west wind came forward amaine, and (as seemed) they made for Plymouth. But whether their Commission were otherwise, or for that they saw the English shippes out of the harbour, they passed by, towards Calis, well hoping about those coasts to meet with Prince Parma, by whose waiting that way the English got the wind, and efusons gaue them chase, and encounter, where fire, smoake and echoing Canons beganne the parley, and bullets most freely exchanged betwix them, were messengers of each others mind.

(203) The next day the two Fleets fought within Musket shot, where the English Admirall fell most hotely on the Vice-Admirall of Spain, at which present they well perceived their owne over-sights; their great shippes (like Castles) powerful to defend, but not off-end, to stand but not to moue, and therefore faire visit for fight in those narrow seas: their enemies nimble and ready at all sides to annoy them, and as apt to escape harme themselves, by being low built, and easily lhor ouer. Therefore they gathered themselves close in forme of a halfe Moone, and slackned their sailes, that their whole Fleet might keepe together. Notwithstanding, one of their great Gallions, wherein was Don Pedro de Valdes, Vicoytor de Silua, Alonso de Sayas, and other Noblemen, was fore battered by the English shot, in avoiding whereof hee fell fowle vpon another shippe, and ere hee could bee cleared, had her fore-mast broken off, which lo hindred her saile, that shee was vnable to keepe way with the Fleet, nor they of courage to succour the Lords, but left both shippe and them, in this sudden and vnlooked for distress. But aight coming on, and saile lagging behind, the Lord Admirall supposing neither men nor Mariners to be left within board, and fearing to loose sight of the Spaniards, past by, and followed the Lamorne, which hee tooke to be borne by Sir Francis Drake, but that renowned Knight, busied vpon five great hulks purified them amain, which being haled, were found to be Easterlings, & therupon freed from his further harmes.

(204) The next day following, Sir Francis Drake copying this lagging Gallion, sent forth a Pinnasse to command them to yeelde, otherwile his Bullettes should force them without further fauour; but Valdes, to seeme valorous answered, that they were foure hundred and fifty strong, that himselfe was Don Pedro, and stood on his honour, therupon propounding certaine conditions. But the Knight lent his reply, that hee had not leisure to patley, if hee would yeeld, presently doe it, if not hee should well proue that Drake was no daffard; whereupon Pedro hearing that it was the Sir Francis Drake (euer terrible to the Spaniards) who had him in chase with forty of his followers came on board Sir Francis his shippe; where first giuing him the Conge, he protested, that hee and all his were resolved to die in defence, had they not fallen vnder his power, whose valout and felicity was so great, that Mars and Nephtun seemed to outstee him in his attempts, & whole generous mind towards the vanquished, had often bene experienced, euen of his greater focs. Sir Francis requiring his Spaniard complements with honourable English certelies, placed him at his owne Table, and lodged him in his owne Cabbin. The residue of that company were lent vnto Plymouth, where they remained eightene monethes, till their ransom were paid: but Sir Francis his soldiers had well paid themselves with the spoile of the shippe, wherein were fifty five thousand Ducats in gold, which they shared merite among them. The same day Michael de Oquendo Admirall to the Quedron Gaspares, and Vice-Admirall to the whole Fleet, suffered no lesse disaster, whose ship being one of the greatest Gallions, fell suddenly on fire, all the vpper part of the shippe, and most of the perions therein consumed, howbeit the Gunpowder in the hold was all saved, and the rest of the scorched Spaniards with the hulke brought into Plymouth, to the great ioy of the beholders.

(205) Vpon Tuesday the twenty third of Iuly, the Spaniards approaching right against Portland, the wind came about into the North, as fit as could bee wished to further their desires; but the English agill, and foreseeing all harmes, recovered the aduantage thereof from the Spaniards, and continued that day from morning till night, in battering those vast wooden Castles with shot both great and small; which forced them for their further safety, to gather themselves close into a roundell, their beell and greatest ships standing without, & securing the battered and lesse. On this day the lastest fight was performed: wherein, besides other remarkable harmes, a great Venetian shippe with some other smaller, were surprisid, and taken by the English.

(206) The foure and twenty day of this present Month, the fight was onely betwene the foure great Gallies, and the English shippes, the Spaniards hauing the aduantage, theirs being rowed, and our sailes vnailed, by reason of the calme, which notwithstanding they fore galled the enemy with chaines shot, therewith cutting a funder their caddings, cables, and cordage to their no little annoyance. But wanting powder, which lo freely they had spent, they sent men on land for a further supply, which ministered dislikes (if not suspitions) to many, that wee should thus want vpon our owne coasts. In which interim a Council was called, wherein it was decreed that the English Fleet should be diuided into foure squadrons, and those committed to foure worthy Captaines, and most skillfull Navigators, whereof the Admirall in the Arke Royal was chiefe, Sir Francis Drake in the Swallow, the second, Captain Hemkins the third, and Capaine Frederick the fourth. Other most valiant Captaines there were in her Malice Shippes, as the Honourable Lord Thomas Howard in the Lion, the Lord Sheffield in the Beare, Sir Robert Southwell in the Elizabeth Town, Captain Baker in the Pilgrimage, and Capaine George Fomer in the Galion Leicester.

ards were arrived against the Isle of Wight, where was a terrible encounter, each shooting off their whole sides, and not above six score yards the one from the other, till at length the English so battered the Spanish high Turrets, that they were forced once more to secure themselves in a roundell, and the foresaid Generalls so worthily bore themselves in this conflict, that the Lord Admirall bestowed the Order of Knight-hood vpon the Lords Howard and Sheffield, Master Iohn Hawkins, Martin Probysher, and others. And yet (by the Spanish brags) a false rumour was spread in France, that England was wholly conquered by the Spaniards.

July 27.

(108) Their Fleet making forward about Sunset, the 27. of the same moneth, came against Dunkirk, and anchored within sight of Callis, intending for Dunkirk, there to ioyne with the Duke of Parma his forces, without which they well saw, they could doe nothing. The English Fleet following vpon hard vpon them call anchor so neere, that they lay within Caluering shot. Where the Lord Henry Seymer vntied his to the Lord Admiralls shippes. Meane while the Duke of Medina sent vnto Parma, to bid him make ready his long expected forces, with which messengers many Noblemen of the Spaniards went on Land, among whom was the Prince of Asselt the Kings half sonne, who so well liked his shipping, that hee made no great halt againe from shpping: wherein he was onely fortunate, for that his Gallion was call away vpon the Irish coast, and neuer returned to salute Spain.

(109) Duke Parma hearing the best of this voyage, makes all things ready that lay in his charge; whose hopes were so fixed for Englands Conquest, that the glittering Diamond vpon Queene Elizabeths head, dazled his ambitious eye, being assured by Cardinall Allen, that he was the man designed to be crowned therewith, and who, from the Pope and Spaine should hold that Kingdome himselfe. Wherefore thinking his Coronet of the Low Countries Government, would haue trouble the English Crowne, and both too weighty to be worn vpon one head, he committed that charge vnto Count Mausfeld the Elder, and making his vowes vnto Saint Mary of Hall in Holland, was already in conceit no lesse then a King. But soone the date of his raigne was expired, and his swelling tide fallen into a Low shallow ebbe; for the day following in his march towards Dunkirk hee heard the thundering Ordinance ring the passing peale of his stile and title, and the same evening had newes of the hard success of the Spaniards, the hoped aduancers of his dreamed fortunes.

The fleets dis-anchored from Callis by Spaniards.

July 28.

(110) They lying the at anchor nere Callis, to ioyne their powers with Parma, were forced thence by a politike stratageme thus: Their Shippes, as Castles pitched in the sea, had their bulkes so planked with great beames, that bullets might strike and strike, but neuer passe through, so that little assailed the English Cannons, except onely in playing on their masts and tackling; whereupon, by her Maiesties aduise and appointment, eight of the English Shippes were discharged of men, and filled with gunpowder, pitch, brimstone, and other combustible matter; their Ordinance charged with bullets, stones, chaines, and the like, which vpon Sunday, the eight and twenty of July, at two of the clocke after mid-night, were let drine with winde and tide among the Spanish Fleet, whose Pilots returning, and their traines taking fire, such a saddaine thunder-clap was giuen, that the Spaniards, affrighted in the dead of the night, were stricken into a horrible feare, least all their shippes should bee fired by these, which present mischiefe to auoide, in great perplexity, they halst to cut their owne Cables, the time being too short to weigh vp their anchors, and hoisting their Gales did drue at randome into the Seas, in which haile and confusion the greatest of their Galliaffes fell soule vpon another ship, and lost her Rudder, so that guidelesse she droue with the tide vpon a shelue in the shoare of Callis, where shee was assaulted by the English.

A Galliaffes killed.

(111) This Galliaffe was of Naples; her General, Hugh de Alencade, who fought the more valiantly in hope of present release of the Prince of Parma; but Sir Amias Prefton gaue so fierce an assault, that Alencade was shot dead with a bullet, and the Galliaffe boarded; wherein was many a Spanish helme, and a number of the tell leaping into the Sea, were drowned; yet Don Antonio de Matigori, a principall Officer, had the hap to escape; and was the first man that brought into Spain the welcomes of this now vincible Navy. This huge Bottom, manned with four hundred Souldiers, and three hundred slanes, had in her hold fifty thousand Ducats of the Spanish Kings treasure, a booty well fitting the English souldiers affections; who, having ransacked all, and freed the slanes from their miserable fetters, went about to set that vessel of Empines on fire; but Monsieur Gaudon, the gouernour of Callis, fearing some danger to the Towne or Haven, would not permit them, but discharged his ordinance against such as assailed it.

July 28.

(112) The morning after this their miserable hap, ranging themselves againe into order, they approached ouer against Graveling, where once againe the English getting the winde, the Spanish were thereby deprived of the Conueniency of Callis roade, and kept from supply oar of Dunkirk; in which port had rested their full hope of support. Notwithstanding they were forced to passe by, and so followed by the English, that their ships discharged vpon them from morning till night, the conflict proving diuinall to the invincible Armada; for therein a great Gallion of Biscay perished, the Captaine thereof to auoid ignominy, not to be accounted valorous, desperately slew each others, in which distresse also two other great ships preferelye sunke. The Saint Philip, and Saint Mathew, two Portugall Gallions, were so corn with shot, their tacklings for aye, and their haikes rent, that the water entred in on all sides; in the former of which, was Francis de Toledo, being Colonel ouer two and thirty bands, who taking his course for the Coast of Flanders, the leake was so great, that hee with others, committing themselves to the Skiffe, arrived at Offend, and the Ship, with the Residue, were taken by the Vlster giers.

A Gallion taken.

(113) In the Saint Mathew was embarked Don Diego Pimentelle, Campe-maister, and Colonel also of thirty two bands; whose Shippe, though very strong, was so pierced with shot, that her Leakes could not be stopp, which knowne, the Duke of Medina sent him skiffe for him; and some others, to save themselves from their imminent danger. But hee, vpon a Spanish braue, refused so to doe, saying each way to free himselfe like a souldier; but not able to keepe taile with the Fleet, hee forth with made toward the coast of Flanders, where being espied by five men of warre, was met with, and required to yeeld, which lastly hee did vnto Captaine Peter Banderaduffe; who carried him into Zeland, where, for a trophie of Victory, his Banner was hung vp in the Church of Leiden in Holland, whose length reached from the very toofe vnto the ground; and another Ship of lesse burden coasting also for Flanders, was call away on the sands.

(114) The Spaniards now finding their BYEN-VIDA vnto England far other then they expected, were content to couch their fleet close together, not seeking to assaile but to defend; and the league comming to the South-west, in the same order passed by Dunkirk, whom the English still followed. But least Parma should play vpon aduantage, the Lord Admirall dispatched the Lord Henry Seymer, with his Squadron of small ships, vnto the coast of Flanders, to second those Hollanders which there kepe watch vnder the conduct of

Their charge was, to hoptall entrance into their Hagues, or encounter with Danbrake, whether Duke Parma intended; though his men were unwilling, hearing how their friends were welcome at the sea, onely the English fugitives, about seven hundred, under the command of that treacherous Knight Sir William Stanley, were very forward to bee the first that should alight England.

(215) But the Armado, being now pasted the place of their expected supply, and having gotten more Sea-room for their huge bodied bulkes, *spread their maine files, and made away as fast as wind and water would give them leave, more fearing the small Fleete and forces of the English, (though nothing in number like vnto them) then standing vpon termes of honour, either of their chieftaines or Invincible Navy. But surely, if they had knowne the want of powder that our sustinained, (a fault vnexcusable vpon our owne coasts,) they no doubt would haue flood longer to their tacklings; but God in this, as the rest, would haue vs to acknowledge, that we were onely deliuered by his owne gracious providence and Arme, and not by any policy or power of our owne.

The Spanish
Armado first.

(216) The Finchle Armado holding on their way, the English Admirall followed, least they should stay to put into Seuill; but the winde coming faire, and feare of more encounters, with all their files spread they bestooke themselves to fight, leaving Seuill on the West, and bending toward Norway; it aduised (but that necessity wroge, & God had infused their counsils) to put their shalke and battered bottoms into those blacke and dangerous Seas; neither was the Climate healthfull for the crazed bodies of the Spaniards, over-beaten and tyred with warts, being now entered the degree of Latitude. 57. from whence the Lord Admirall returned, leaving some Scouts to delery their successe.

August 4.

consideration.

(217) The Spaniards now cleared from those their hanting spirits, consulted most seriously what was to be done: the Popes credit was to bee respected, who had predicted this voyage to fortune successe; the wrath of King Philip was to be feared, his great expences thus lost; the adventures looser if the voyage should bee left: the glory of the Spaniards laid in the dust, the Invincible Navy in the ebbe of her fame; and England still England, not lorded by the spaniard, if they thus without further attempt should returne into Spain. But with all, fine thousand of their souldiers were slaine; multitudes of sicke and maimed lay on their hands; twelue of their greatest ships were sunke, lost, and taken; their Cables, Masts and Sailes, cut, rent, and broken, with the English shot, their ankers left, where the fired Hulkes forced them, their victuals failing, and fresh-water all spent, their enemies no lesse fierce and vnduntable, then fortunate; and their long expected friend, the Duke of Parma, though euer preparing, yet still forestalled by the Dutch, most firme Allies vnto the Queene: these circumstances wisely balanced, the voice went current for speeding into Spain.

The Spaniards
call their bodies from the sea.

(218) But knowing that Seuill (whose Religious King was fast knit in affection, and blood vnto Queene Elizabeth) would yield them no comfort, and hopelesse altho that Norway would give them any supply, they call all their Males and Hories oner-board for sparring of their fresh-water: then framing their course to slide about Cathenes and the coasts of Ireland, so proceeded between the Oreades and Isles of Fero vnto the 61. degree Northward, whence the Duke of Medina, with his best stored shippes tooke Westward oer the maine Ocean towards Biscay, and so arrived safely in Spain, where for his Widow, hee was deposed from all his authority, forbidden to come at the Court, and commanded to bee priuate. Neither could hee thus give satisfaction for his bad successe, albeit he imputed it to the treachery of his mariners, their ignorance, and small experience of those Northern Seas, the want of succors from the Prince of Parma, the treachery, shipwracks, and ill fortune, but not a word of the judgements of God vpon this Gyranlike attempt to enslave all England to the mountains of Orreade, orto the mines of Pera.

(219) The residue of his ships, about forty in number, fell neerer with the coast of Ireland, intending for Cape Clare, where they well hoped to water; but the winde contrary, and tempests storming vpon those dangerous Seas, many of their ships perished vpon the shoares of Ireland, and among other a great Galliesse, wherein Nicolas de Oquendo was a commander, and two other of Venice, both ships of great barren, besides thirty eight more, together with most of the Spaniards contained within them. Those that got cleare of the danger, put forth to Sea, whereof some with a strong West winde were driven into the chanel of England, where part of them were taken by the English, others by men of England in France, and some arrived at Newham in Normandy. In so much, that of one hundred thirty four ships, which had set sail out of Lisbon, onely fifty three returned to Spain: of the foure Gallieses of Naples, but one: of the foure Gallieses of Portugall, but one; and of the ninety one Gallieses, and great Hulkes from diuers Provinces, only thirty three returned, fifty eight being lost in briefe, there were missing of their whole fleet foure-score and one vessels, and of the thirty thousand souldiers, thirteenth thousand, five hundred and odd. Of prisoners taken in England, Ireland and the Low-Countries were two thousand and more. In England, Don Pedro de Valdeir, Don Falsque de Sylva, and Don Alonso de Sayes and others were kept for their rancke: in Zeland, Don Diego de Perenelle, and in Ireland, Don Alonso de Lucern, Roderigo de Lajis and others of great account: to conclude, there was no famous or worthy family in all Spain, which in this expedition lost not a sonne, a brother, or a kinsman.

(220) Thus were these Sea-fiecces effected as for the Land, preparations were made throughout the Kingdom, but the maine forces lying encamped at Tilbury vnder the command of the Earle of Leicester, thither her Majesty in person vpon the ninth of August repaired, full of Princely resolution, and more then feminine courage, whole lonely presence and imperiall speeches, as shee passed the lowe American Emperre through all her Army, were so acceptable and gracious, that Her souldiers, full-fraught with manly spirit, yet received an access of hardiness from so alacrious a patterne in their Majesty: and both they perceived so well the loue of their Prince, and therefore what it was to haue the loue of her subjects, that the harmony of both their affections was admirable, both of them professing resolution, and willing to sacrifice their liues in that most righteous quarrell. But the God of Hosts, hauing now prevented their forwardness, without losse of English blood, soon loosened the Campe was dissolved: and not long after Leicester ended his daies, hauing bene a Prince of great estate, but lyable to the common destiny of most Great ones, whom all men magnifie in their life time, but few speake well of after their death.

(221) The Land thus deliuered by the arme of the Omnipotent, and the Boer put back that sought to lay Englands faire vine-yard waste, Queene Elizabeth (who euer held ingratitude a Capital sinne, but especially towards her Almighty protectour) commanded solenne Thankes-giving to bee celebrated vnto the Lord God of Hosts, at the Cathedral Church of Saint Pauls in Her chiefe City of London, which which accordingly was done vpon Sunday the eight of September, where eleven of the Spanish Ensignes (the once badges of their brauery, but now of their vanity) were hung vpon the lower battlements of that Church, as palmes of praise for England's deliverance; a few no doubt more acceptable to God, then when their spread colours did set out the pride of their shippes, threatening the blood of many innocent and faithfull Christians.

(222) The next day, the faire being kept in Southwarke, these faire flagges were spread vpon London-Bridge to the great ioy of the beholders, and eternall memory of Spanish purposes, as irreligious as vnprosperous. But the solempne day assigned to be kept holy throughout the land, was the nineteenth of November being Tuesday, which accordingly was then done, and would to God had so continued still, being no lesse for our deliverance, then was that Parus for the Iewes, which they inflicted to be kept holy throughout their generations.

(223) Queen Elizabeth therefore, to bee her selfe an example vnto others, vpon the Sunday following, being the foure and twentieth of Nouember, repayed from the Pallace of White-Hall, in Westminster, through the streets of London in great Estate: and came accompanied with her Nobilitie vnto the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, where dismounting from her Chariot at the West-dore, shee humbled her selfe vpon her knees, and with great deuotion audibly praised God, acknowledging him her onely Defender, who had thus deliured the land from the rage of the enemy. And after the Sermon ended, wherein none other Argument was handled, but onely of prayse and glory to bee rendered vnto God; her Majesty herselfe with most princely and Christian speeches exhorted all the people to their due performance of those religious traictees of thankfullnesse vnto God, like vnto another Iafael, Dauid, and Iofias. The Zelanders also to leane a Memoriall of their no lesse gratitude to God, then faithfullnesse to the Queene, caused a new Cape of silver to be stamped, hauing on the one side the Armes of their Country engrauen, with this Inscription, Gloria Deo alone, and on the other side, the portraicts of great ships, vnder-railed, The Spanish Fleet, and in the circumference, It came, went, and was. Anno 1588. Wherein they alluded to that quicke worke of Cafar, ¶ Veni, vidi, vici, which wee haue seene also excellently described in deuise, where on the one side, the Spanish Fleet had inscribed veni, the Swarm (the eye of the whole world) vidi, and the English Navy, vici. In other coines also were stamped ships beating, & sinking, and in the reverse, supplicants vpon their knees, with this Motto, Meo propefecto, God disposeth. 1588. To the like effect also the Hollanders stamped the remembrance of this Armada in their monies, after the example of the Ancients, whose vie was to inscribeth their vittories vpon their Coines, of which kind were those with Spanish Shipper, having this Word, Impius fugit nemine sequente.

(226) The thunderclappe of this Spanish Armado thus past, and the immense vanquished, as the attempt & Issue was open to the eyes of the world, so the due consideration thereof was rooted in all true English hearts; whereupon the Nobles and Community being then assembled for Parliament, this court was at length thought fittest, that the proud Catholic should be requir'd vpon his owne coalls: And first it was determined to aide Don Antonio the expelled King of Portugall, whose title was apparently farre more iust then either Philip for England, or Stakeley for Ireland, both which Kingdoms they had in holie manner invaded: and thus the rather was resolu'd on, for that the Spanish King was endeavouring to repaire his dishonour by repairing his Fleet and Forces for a new expedition against England.

(227) This Don Antonio among other Competitors claimed the Crowne of Portugall after the decease of King Henry, as sprung from King Emmanuel by his soane Don Lewis the Infant; but alledged by the Philippians to haue been his Raffard. Against which accusation Don Antonio had sentence for his legitimation by the Bishoppe of Augs; and every way sought to rubbe off that scandalous imputation. His conditions were such as well befit a Crown, he being a Prince of greater spirit then perion, and yet of rare modesty and humility, seasoned with a disposition vey deuout and religious, whereby hee came to bee in furre better fauour and esteem then Philip of Spain, for which cause hee was first made Defender of the Realme by the Gouernours, and afterwards accepted King by the people, whereto he was in a manner enforced, seeing himselfe enuironed with many drawn swordes in midst of a furious multitude.

(228) But Philip as more ambitious, so more strong in men and munition, made warre into Portugall, and by his Generall, Duke Alba, put this new King vnto flight; after which fortune, himselfe eueres Portugall, where hee proclaimed eight hundred thousand Crownes to him that could bring him Don Antonio either aliue or dead. But such was their looe vnto this vnfortunate Prince, that eight monethes hee kept in Portugall disguised, and had conueration and conference with many, yet was neuer betrayed; but not able to hold vp his side, the Gouernours (as is the fashion of the world) daily falling to his brouger, after many conflicts, and much lamenting their miserable estate, left the Spaniard (who then gaped for nothing, but Kingdomes) to possesse the Government of Portugall.

(229) Antonio's kingly stile thus ended, before it was thoroughly begunne; Philip had subiectious offered him aide, and in such sort, as some that seem'd Competitors, yielded him their rights, among whom Katherine Dutcheffe of Braganza was one; yea and Pope Gregorie himselfe, who had hitherto sided with Don Antonio, the Prior of Crate, knowing it was fittest to hold with the stronger, sent Philip his Apostolicall allowance, the better to put on his New-gotten Crowne, exhorting him to thankfulness, for these his prosperities, and moving him earnestly to make warre against England, with prospects of assistance as he hath said.

(310) Don Antonio thus driven out of his Kingdome, for succour repaired unto the Court of France; where, of the Queene Mother, a pretended Competitor for the Portugall Crowne, he was both favoured and aided as Senor for the Idea of Treuer: but such was his destiny in his Sea-fights also (the Peruian said being no lesse powerful then the Spanish Canons) that eight of the tallest French Ships were lost, & two thousand men slain, among whom was the Lord Philip Trassy the Generall, whose death was so taken, and the expedition so censured, as the Portugall Captaines were repared for Conwards, imprisoned in France, and many of them charged with corruption and treason, so that all his hopes were now in the wane, and no further assistance could be expected of the French.

(311) The pore Prince thus dejected in France, knowing the vnnierall report of Queene Elizabeth his great fame, obtained leave of her Maiesty for successe vnto her sacred presence, whose Court had ever been a famous Sanctuary to all oppressed Princes, or distressed Estates: where shewing his right to the Portugall Crowne, and clearing the objections touching his Right (which imposition in sundry languages hee refused in Print to the publicke view of his Kingdome, England having too just an occasion to be against Spain). Among whom once more he assayed to tie the favour of Fortune; his Petition to the Queene being onely this, that she would but land him life in his Countrey and amongst his own People, of whose affured love and readinesse to receive him as their King, and thence forward to defend him and his iust Title, hee nothing doubted. So honest and reasonable a suit could not but finde fauour with so gracious a Queene: whereupon provision being made for the Portugall voyage, he embarked at Plimouth in April, whence fixe of the Queenes shippes, and twenty more of warre (besides many other ordained for transportation) spread their Sailes vnder the conduct of the ever-famous Sir Francis Drake, and the most valourous Sir John Norris Generall for the land service, with eleven thousand soldiers, and twenty five hundred Mariners. Their landing in a Bay of Galicia, nere vnto the Grina, in their March were met and encountered within halfe a mile of the Towne, but their enemies were soone forced to retire vnto their Gates.

(312) The next day General Norris having viewed the advantage, resolved to streame the place by a Scalado, and to land some Artillery, to beat the ships and Gallies which did play vpon their troopes, which was effectually performed, and the Gallies forced to abandon the Roade, the Bate-Town was surprized, and in three severall places entered, where the Inhabitants with a great cry took into the high Towne, but some prevented, escaping the fury of the sword fied to the Rocks, where they were found and slain to the number of five hundred. Among these he had, Don Juan de Luna, a man of great command, was one, who the next morning came forth, and yielded himselfe to the Generals devotion; Juan de Vera, a Commissary of victuals, was likewise taken, who confessed that there was in the Towne three hundred thousand Ducats of silver, and order given for the baking of three hundred thousand of Bisket, that the Towne was stored with two thousand Pipes of wine, a thousand Barres of Oyle, three thousand Kineles of Beefe, a great quantitie of Herbes, Pease, Wheat and Fife, and of March and Harqueboites three Barkes were brought thither not long before. All which (hee confessed) were for a new voyage against England. And indeed such store of wines was there found, as the English Souldiers vsing little moderation in drinking, did not onely lay themselves open to danger from the vpper Towne, but by distemperature inflamed and infected their blood, that it caused a greata mortality and infection in the whole Army.

(313) The Bate-Town thus gotten, a sudden reliefe of two thousand men so retolutely came to the very Gates, as though no contrary power could possibly keepe them from entrance, but in the first brunt of resistance, they were content to make their bodies the life-guardians of their heads, of whom very many were cut short by the English portiers. With the like feare the shippes in the Roade were freight, whole Souldiers ouercharging the great Ordinaes of a great Gallion, abandoned her daies, and set her on fire, which for the space of two daies burned in most terrible wise, so that of fifty great peeces but six were found whole, the rest broken and melted, and so brought away by the English; but the higher towne strong both by situation and its facility for resistance, retolutely held out, onely intressed by Parley to heare faire termes. And being built for the most part on a hard rocke, one place was found miserable, where the Generali the fourth day of this siege let men on worke, who bedded their powder from whar too short of the wal, whereby that designe took not the as spaiied effect. But this error reduced, another as great was committed, for the Miners againe set on worke, came right vnder the Wall, but somewhat wide of a great Tower therupon built, so that when the blast of powder brake forth, it ouerthrew but a part of the same, and left the other standing rotering and shaken, which being not regarded, in the heat of assault, fell suddenly vpon the English, and slew Capaine Sydnam with thirty Souldiers besides, to the great astonishment of the rest there employed, not knowing the cause whereof it came, but rather suspecting it a Strageme of the Towne, and the rest of the rubbish lay so loose vnder foot, that the Assaulters could haue no sure standing to make their fight.

(314) Whilst these things were in doing, the General had certaine notice that the Cande de Angra had assembled an Army of eight thousand strong, which was but the beginning of another more strong, leued vnder the Cande de Alenteira; the former, not passing fix miles off, and both of them intending the rescue of the Grina: To prevent which, Sir John Norris with nine Regiments met them, and presently fell to abate skirnish, whole brunt the enemy not able to endure, broke on a Bridge, built vpon a Creeke of the Sea, at the further foot whereof their Campe lay very strongly entrenched. Sir Edward Norris, Colonel Sydnam, the Capaine Hinder, Fulford, and Barton entered the Bridge, whose further end was barricaded with Barrells, where coming to push of pike and sword, Sir Edward was grievously hurt in the head, Capaine Hinder received five wounds in the head and face by the Sword; Capaine Fulford hurt in the left arme with a shoe, and Capaine Barton hurt in the eye. Norwithstanding, the Generali seconded the encounter as the Guard was ouerthrowne, and the whole Army put into route, of whom our men had the Chase fully three miles in four sundry wayes. In this seruice the Kingi Standard was taken, some plate and rich apparell found in their Campe, and the Countrey for three Miles compass set on flaming fire; the General making his retreat with the Kingi Colours and Armes displayed before him, to the great honour of the English.

(235) Thus returning vnto the Groine, and wanting Cannons to batter the walles, the English fired the Baile-Towne, embarked from thence, and put againe to Sea. But the windes being contrary, many affaies were made before the Fleet could recover the Burlings, in which passage Robert Earle of Essex with Marsialler Denmore his brother, accompanied with others, came to the Fleet, which Earle hauing put himselfe into the iourney against the opinion of the world, or well-liking of the Queene, seemed vnto the Sager fort to hazard his fortunes but other more heauy spirits, held it the great aduancement of his reputation; whereof I thinke I may say, as Tacitus said of Vespasian employment in Brittaine, That there was laide the first foundation of his future glorie.

(236) The Fleet thus increased, they landed in Portugall, euen vnder foot of the Castle of Peniche, where the Sea growing high, many were in perill of drowning; for most of them waded to the walle for the Shore. Of this Towne and Pecece, Conde de Puentri had the command, who with five Companies of Spaniards sallied out against the English, and made their approach close to the Sea-side whereupon the Earle of Essex with Sir Roger Williams diuided their men into two Troopes, the one keeping the Sands along the Shore, and the other ouer the sand-hilles made towards the in-land. Which the enemy seeing, halld to the encounter, and came vnto fight, euen within push of Pike; but were so entertained, as they had no great liking, but presently turned their backs, and fled further then the English had reason to follow. The Towne they left vndefended, so that it was entered without any resistance, and the Castle summoned the same night, the Capitaine whereof was Antonio de Azevedo, a Portugall, who demanding, and being satisfied, that Dou Antonio was present, gaue vp the pecece, with the mention therein. Vnto this place some Fryers & other poore of the Country, came to welcome their King, promising him (in the name of the rest) a sufficient supply both of horse and foot, which notwithstanding was neuer performed.

(237) Here it was thought fitt that the wounded and sick should remaine, with sufficient provision, and seven companies of foot to guard the ships and Castle; and the maine Army to march ouer land vnto Lisbon, the Metropolitane of Portugall, accounted the strongest Fort in the World, and whoeuer held that, might (in their extreme) make head against the mightiest Monarch in the Earth; whither likewise Sir Francis Drake (General of the Sea-service) promised to come, if the iniury of weather did not hinder him. The March vnder taken, Torres Pedras made some shew of resistance, but presently vpon the approach of the English, that Castell was abandoned, and left to the possession of Dou Antonio, whose hopes hereupon beganne to enlarge, thinking the whole would stand for his claime; but therein was not a litle decayed, for victuals growing scarce in the Army, the Country did not supply them according to expectation, neither came in any of strength. Notwithstanding the English Army from Pedras marched to Sao Sebastian, thence to Leris, and lodged the fifth day at Alentejo, three miles from Lisbon, where many of their Soldiers perished by drinking in two places of poisoned standing waters, as also in eating of honey, purposely left in the houses, and spiced with poison, as it was thought.

(238) The five and twentieth of May, the English Army came vnto Lisbon, whose Suburbs were found abandoned, houses of provision for come & victuals fired, and none left to defend but a sort of olde folkes and beggars, crying in the streets, Plas el Rey Dou Antonio, and about midnight they within the Towne let fire on their houses that stood within vpon the wall. The English wearied with the six daies march, want of victuals, the last nights watch, and many of them weake, were desirous of rest; whereof the enemy hauing aduertisement, in the dead of the night sallied out of the Towne, and made their assault in three severall streets, but chiefly vpon Colonel Brett Quarters, who being as rest (as most of the Army were) with what halt was possible, put himselfe, and his in Armes, & so thoroughly made head, that hee was slaine in the place, Capitaine Carr with the like resistance and valour ended his life; Capitaine Carley wounded to death; Capitaine Carr hurt, but not mortally. The others found not their attempts so safe, but were put to a suddaine and soule retreat; in which the Earle of Essex (full of high pirite, and hotte youthly blood) had them in chase to the very gates of the high towne; and (as it was truly reported) the enemies loode did triple the English, as well in quantity, as in men of quality.

(239) Mean while General Drake with his whole Fleet was come to Cafesio, and possessed the towne without any resistance, for the inhabitants at the discovery of his Name, fledde with bagge and baggage into the mountaines, which the General perceiving, sent vnto them a Portugall Pilot, to offer them all peaceable kindnesse, so as they would accept of their rightfull King, and manlier necessities to the Army which hee had brought. Which offer they ioyfully embraced, and presently sent two chiefe men of the Towne, to signify their loyalty to Dou Antonio, and their honest affection to his Army, whereupon Sir Francis immediately landed his Companies, but not without perill of the Castell, which being guarded by the Spaniards, held out against him for their King.

(240) At Lisbon the Portugals had promised to aid Antonio with three thousand horse, besides other supplies from the Duke of Bragansa, Dou Francisco de Toledo, and others, at a day preuided, and now altogether fail, by reason (as it seemeth) that the Spaniards having chiefe command in all places, they were vnable by any means to make head. Whereupon the vnfortunate Antonio seeing the time expired, & but forty horse come, nor of foot sufficient to furnish two Embassies, grew almost hopelesse, yet aimed hee to perswade a stay before Lisbon for 9. dayes more; but the Towne being strong, and the English declining (for there was the first apparent sign of sicknesse among them) the Portugals backward, and of base resolutions, ready to obey any so themselves may be rich; and the General hauing already done more then was promised, left they should hazard the honour which hitherto had bene gotten, denied his request, and gaue present order to return to Cafesio, himselfe, the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams remaining with the stand, that was made in the high street, till the whole Army was drawne into the field: at which time, the King (then herein of kindly disposition towards his Natures) made request to lene the Suburbs from spoile, which if the English had refused, they had bene the richer; Arme that euer returned to England. But now ready to depart Lisbon, the noble Essex in the courage of his Marciall blood, ranne his speare and brake it against the Gates of that City: demanding alowde, if any Spaniard mewed therein, durst adventure forth in fauour of his Mistresse to breake a blasse with him. But those Gallant thought it safer to court their Ladies with amorous discourses, then to haue their loues written on their breasts with the point of his English Speare.

(241) Being now come to Cafesio, intelligence was brought by a Fryer, that the enemy was marched vnto Saint Iohn with a strong power to encounter the English, vnto whose General, the General Norris lent a Trumpet, promising to meete him the next morning if hee durst abide his coming, and withall gaue him the lie: the Earle of Essex also sent him a particular Carrell, offering himselfe against any of theirs, if they had any of his qualitie, or else fixe, eight or tenne, to trie single combats, whereat this Spaniards combe was so cut, as in the night, before battell, in great feare and perturbation bee dislodged, and returned to Lisbon, not answering the Challenge, but threatening to hang the Messenger, who followed him even to the very Gate. Then was the Collie of Cajean tended upon condition, that the men of Armes should depart with bag and baggage; which Peace in part, by the Order of the Generall, was blowne up by mine. During which time threefoore Hobles laden with Corn, Malts, Cables, Copper, and Waxe, being the Spanish Kings provision were taken going to Lisbon.

(142) The English hauing thus farre proceeded, put againe to Sea, when, vnlooked for, and in a great calme, nine Gallies fell in the winde of their Fleet, and so plaid vpon a fringing Barke of Plimouth, that Capitaine Caladrey, his Lieutenant, the Master, and some of the Mariners, abandoning the vessell, betooke them to their Boates, whereof one, (in which the Capraine and Master were) was ouercome by the Gallies, and they both drowned. Two other Hukles alio fringing from the Fleet, were fet vpon by the Spaniards, in one of which, Capitaine Atimble fought to the last, and very valiantly alter his ship was on fire, but whether fired by himselfe or the enemy, could not be iudged; the calme being to still, as no succour could bee sent from the Fleet, to their great griefe.

(143) Thus continuing fouenteene daies on board, many of the dead Souldiers were call into the Sea; and the whole now consisted of two thousand men, who coming to Pige, found every fleet fenced with a strong Barricado, and but only one man in the Towne, the inhabitants making toward Bayen as fast as they could drive, then was both the Town and all the Countrey for leuen miles compass set on a flame. Which seruice thus performed, Sir Francis Drake with the Queenes ships safely arrived at Plimouth, and vpon the second of Iuly following arrived Sir John Norris, hauing both of them performed the parts of worthy Generals.

(144) Whilst these Realmes were at variance each against others, the French were not quiet among themselves, the King some what voluptuous, but excessively prodigal towards his favorites; the Nobility ambitious, mistrustfull, and disloyall; the Clergy turbulent, and vndutifull, bending all their force and thoughts against the plantation of the truth. To waite friendship therefore some league had beene made, for confirmation whereof the three Estates were assembled at plais. For the Clergy appeared one hundred thirty foure deputies, among whom were foure Arch-bishops, one and twenty Bishops, and two Generals of Orders; for the Nobility came one hundred and foure score gentlemen; and for the third Estate an hundred foure score and eluen Deputies, all of them Lawyers and Merchants. Vpon the first sitting, and before these best wits of France, King Henry made a solemne Oration to perswade vnion, full of lively affection, true magnanimity and pregnant reasons, delivered with such an admirable eloquence and grace, as it rauished the eares of all present, besides the opening of the propoositions, the which, Montaigne, the keeper of the Seale, for him further prosecuted; after him Reynaud de Beaulieu, Arch-bishop of Bourges, Patriarke and primate of Aquaine, spake in the same argument; and lastly, Adriell de Marillac, Prouost and President for the third Estate, confirmed, and consented to all that had beene said. Whereupon an oath of Vnion was taken, to kinde the King, them, and all their posterities, the fundamental Lawes and liberties of France onely reserved.

(145) This notwithstanding, the Leaguers, to hit the marke whereat they aimed, daily diuulged and barozed the French Kings disgrace, and al to install the Guise in his Throne; the Papists wrongs were greedously expatiated, their Churches burnt, and Altars profaned, the people oppressed with impositions and subsidies; places of Iudgement set to sale; and spirituall benefices to him that would giue most; the officers at Court, they alleged, were managed by men of meane rank; the Noblemen seruises neglected and vneuarded. All these, and more, were complained of, and all to make the King base in the peoples eyes, the Guise himselfe the while renporizing with both, as disuading the King to subiect his authority vnto their complaints, and at the same present perswading the other, to bee vengeant in their peruries.

(146) Among their other practices one was against the King of Nauarre, whom the Clergy condemned for an Heresie, the chief (as they termed him) of the relapse, excommunicated and deiered him of the Government of Guerne, and of all other dignities, as being vaworthy of successions of Crownes or Realmes. But Henry, with Effray thought it vnreasonable, to condemn this Prince without hearing, and therefore desired to haue him againe summoned, and againe to bee sworn to the Vnion.

(147) To this motion was answered, that the Cardinal of Bourbon his vncle had once obtained absolution for him; that the Queene mother had many times assured to wince him; many learned doctors had bene sent to reclaim him; but all in vaine. For, from the Cradle (said they) hee hath bene brought vp in this new Heresie, hath bene condemned by the Councell of Trent, received againe into grace by the Consistory, againe fallen into the error which hee abjured, and is now an Heresie, relapsed, vaworthy of obedience, vaworthy of respect, and vaworthy to bee praised for: for the holy See of Rome hath declared him a Schismaticke, excommunicated him as incapable of succession, and therefore must the Estates of France ratifie the Popes fence; and King Henry must thereto subscribe; if not, the Duke of Guise, who was Master of the Castle, and carried the keyes at his owne girdle, would dissolve the assembly and lay all the blame vpon his Maiesty.

(148) Thus then (by the paropole of man) the first Prince of the blood, and the onely remainder, after so many sisters and consens of Amans, Alencon, Eureux, Berry, Bourgoigne, Anglesme and Orleans, and which only succeeded that of Valois, was now deprived of the succession which Nature gaue him, without calling, or hearing of his iustifications.

(149) To further this Guise enterprise, his followers buzd into the heads of them multitude, that it was the Kings Climastrically yeere, and so many presumptions were obserued, as it was told the King in plaine termes that the Duke of Guise would surprize him. Whereupon, hauing remained long in suspense, betwixt the rigour of reuenge, and the mildesse of his owne disposition, at last, by the lightning, supposing a chander-clap would follow, he thought timely to prevent the danger, by taking away his life, that intended the blow. Which was not so secretly carried, but that the designe was discoerred, and a crowle laid vnder Guise his Napkin as he sat at dinner, wherein it was written, that his life was in danger; but hee, as one confident in his owne power, wrote in the same crowle, these words, they dare not, and threw it from him vnder the Table. Other aduertisements hee had (if we may beleue the additions of Sorres from Rome, Spain, Lorraine, and Sauoy, that a bloody Carabroth should dissolve this assembly, their Almanacks had obserued it, and it was generally predicted for Saint Thomas day.

(150) But the Duke beeing himselfe bolde vpon his owne greatness, neglected all moities, and very presumptuously spake to the King, complaining that the affaires of France inclined from bad vnto worse, vncurable, and almost growne desperate, wherefore, the charge hee had recoued, hee would againe giue vp, and retired in the Countrey, kaff

(251) The King, who had retired on his death, gave him good words, with promise of commendment was to him layd, and held him with familiar discourtesies, and favourable countenance, vntill a certaine time should bee offered, which was the three and twentieth of December, when the Lords sitting in Conncell, and entring consultation, the Gisfe was called for vnto the King, who as hee lifted vp the Tapeirie into his Cabinet, was charged vpon by the Guard, and with their swords and partisans presently flung the King anouching, that therneforth hee would rule alone. And not long after the Cardinal of Gisfe, the Duke dranke of the same cup at the commendment of the King.

(254) This death of the Guzze & Cardinal, caused the King to be exceedingly hated of the Papals, whose Preachers bandied his reproches in their Pulpits, incensing the people to open rebellion, and as Furies of hell heaped an hliade of curſes vpon the hede of the Executioner. In Paris the Kings furniture, and in the Louvre his pictures were broken, his Armes beaten down, his Images dragged through the ſtreets, his great Scale defaced, and his royall name blotted with many obprobrious terms. Yet the College of Sorbon was forward as any, concluded by a publick Act, That the people of France were free from the Oath of Obedience and Faith which they ſwore againſt ſuite Henry of Valois, that lawleſſy, and with a good confidence they might arme themſelves againſt him, procure his reſcue, and ſupply it in their warres for his overthrow.

(253) Contrastive the Duke of Guise was exalted to heaven, Orations made of his commendable exploits in Hungary against the Turke, at Ierne against the Protestants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour, at Finney, and at other places; in a word, such were the intestine troubles of France, as the king sent for Henry King of Navarre to help quench the flames of civil edition, which were mounted so high, as that the Leaguers prevailed against the Lords of Parliament, profaned Churches, violated Virgins, and denied their Christian profession with flames of blood. And to fill up the measure of their impious iniquity, a Cardinal Fier, by name James Clement, when the King had besieged Paris (the head City of this rebellion) made vovves to kill the Tyrant (as hee termed him) to free that holy City from Scavenger's Gages, with which resolution hee went to Douglas Bourgeois Priour of his Couent, and imparted this damnable project to him, to Fisher Commend, to other Iesuits, and to the heades of the League, all of them incouraging him to this Diabolical designe, with promise of Abbeys and Bishopricks if hee escaped, and if he died in the action to be made a Martyr, and have place in heaven above the Angels.

(354) Thus furnished with blessings for this cursed day, upon the first of August the Monk went to Paris, and had private access to the King to deliver alms, pretending some matter of importance; but as the King read it, the Diabolical Instrument with a knife from his leece, wounded him in the bottom of his belly, and there it the knife, which the King drew forth, and with the same struck this Turbane above the eye: their struggling being heard, many hastily came in, who seeing the King wounded, and all in gore blood, in their rage flabbed the Monster to death, and not many dayes after, K. Henry died of the wound.

(255) Whereupon Charles Cardinall of Bourbon a younger brother to Anthony King of Navarre, and uncle unto Henry then the present King, was proclaimed Lieutenant Governor, yea and gold and silver coined with his picture and title of Charles the tenth King of France. Howbeit Henry King of Navarre was proclaimed of the Army, whose right was before that Papall Prelates, and whom the late Henry by his last will ordained to bee his Successor. Not withstanding only in respect of his Religion, being a professed Protestant, the Leaguers made such head against him that he was enforced to the vnto that General Sanitary of Princes, Queene Elizabeth for his aide, who euer fauouring the progresse of the Gospel, and knowing Naturis claime to be aboue all other (of that Nation) for the French Crowne, and that the Spaniards was letting foot into France: first, sent him twenty thousand pound sterling, with powder, munition for warre, and certaine ships also to serue at his command; and causing a generall matter to be taken in most of the Shires in England, sent four thousand souldiers furnished, from cities of them into France, to which furnished the Citizens of London sent for a thousand very well appointed and seruicable men: the General of all which forces, was the noble Peregrine Bertes Lord Willoughby: whole waite the again supplied with three thousand foot, which were sent into Brittaine, vnder the conductiō of Sir Iohn Norris, that Ioune of Naturis: hee ioyning with the Prince Dombes Lord General of that Province, performed many worthy exploits for the French King.

(186) But Pearce being entered France, and the Pope with his Cardinals fulminating his Excommunication against Henry and his adherents, Queen Elizabeth (who never was disuaded with such flatteries) sent into France Robert Earle of Essex, for her Lieutenant General over forty thousand footmen, and two hundred horse, (besides many Picquers) all of them to bandy for the King against his enemies the Leaguers. The Earle, though young, yet full of valour, was followed with many valiant Gentleman, whose countenances well shewed the courage of their hearts: Their landing in Normandy, laid siege unto the strong Race, in assault whereof his brother Walter Devereux was slain with a small hurt, to the excessive griefe of the Earle, and others, being a Gentleman trained up, both by Academical and Marshall education, unto very great booke and execution.

(357) But King Henry finding many rubs in his way, the Leaguers still increasing their Strengths from Rome and Spain, and the Crowne of France laid at stake for him that threw most, thought it good policy (though proved to him in the end disastrous and fatal) to temporize with the predominant faction; and therefore leaving the Religion which till then he had bred, fell to that of Rome which ever till then hee had resisted, and after great Help made to the Pope, was fully absolved by the Holy Father, who heaped whole Streams of Blessings upon his sacred head, himselfe swearing to defend the Romish faith against all impugners: so that now all sides fortified, without contradiction, Henry of Navarre was crowned King of France. Only the Spaniards were unwilling to leave that faire Country fortified in Brittaine upon the Rhine, out against Brussels; whence after much slaughter, General Norris forced them, though with the losse of some English, & Life of Captain Garbrier commander of the Fleet.

(258) The Leaguers not liking Namur's advancement, mistaking that his conversion was fained, and temporary, as being but a steppe, the easier to mount the royal throne: by treason laid wait for his life, and sought what they could his conformance at Ramé; whilst the Spaniards employed all their wits for the worrying of France; and so farre perilled in their designs, as King Henry by proclamation denounced warre against Spain; and Philip in like manner proclaimes warre against France; in which flattery hood, during the life of Erasmus Archduke of Austria, brother in law and Nephew unto King Philip, whole Goatsour he then was in the Low-Countries.

(259) After whom succeeded his brother Albertus the Military Cardinall, and Arch-duke of Austria, who no sooner was made Governour in place of his Brother, but that hee prepared against the French and United Estates; and to make his affairs, he first began with Calla, a thing long before proceeded by others in his place; that Towce being a Sea-port of great importance, as the English found it was theirs, and the loſſe thereof great, as Queen Mary and her wife Scots both took it, and left it.

(260) At this time the Garrison was small, and the Gouernour negligent, vndiscreet, and vnforuſe, though having notice from Netherland that the Spaniards meant her ſiege, ſo that Richambe left vnmanned, and in great ruine, was entered vpon by the Cardinals, and ſuch as reſiſted driue into the Towne; where, with the Inhabitantes hee grew to a compoſition for the ſurrender, Myſſen the Gouernour neuer interpoling therein.

Queen Elizabeth's officers and her reason call.

(261) Calla thus turning Spaniſh, and the Spaniards ſtill intending for England, Elizabeth ſolicited the French King, & proffered her aid for recovery of that Place; but hee empow'ered by warre, fought to regaine his loſſes rather by ſome faire conditions of peace, then to depend vpon the dependencies & hazard of Armies; at which reſolution our Noble Scotus was nothing well pleaſed, and therefore to preuent the practices of Spain, began to make good againſt them, and prepared another expedition to Sea. But dealing more prince-like than Philip had done by her (who made faire pretence of peace, when hee was beſieged in preparing warre) hee cauſed to bee publiſhed and printed a Declaration of the cauſes mouing her to let forth her Nauy for the defence of her Realme, the Tenor whereof we thinke not vniſe to be here inſerted.

The Declaration touching the ſeizing forth of a Nauy.

(262) To all Chriſtian people to whom this Declaration ſhall come to be read or heard, greeting; Wee Robert Earle of Leiceſter, and Ewe, Viſcount Hereford, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Bouchier, and Louſaine, &c. and Charles Lord Howard, Baron of Effingham, Lord High Admirall of England, &c. hauing the charge of a Royall Nauy of Shippes, prepared and ſent to the Sea, by the moſt Excellent Princeſſe the Lady Elizabeth, Queene of England, France and Ireland, &c. doe give all men knowledge that the ſaid Nauy under our charge is by her Maieſty prepared, and ſent to ſerue on the Sea, for defence of her Maieſties Realmes, Dominions, and Subiects, againſt ſuch miſchievous Forces as wee are aduerſity from all parties of Chriſtendome, to be already prepared by the King of Spaine, and by further promiſes of men and ſhippes daily ſent for, are to bee mightily increaſed, to invade her Maieſties Realmes, as heretofore in the yearre of our Lord, 1588. was attempted (from whom there was a Treaty continued by both their Commiſſioners for a Peace) with a greater Army then ever before in his time was ſet to Sea: though by Gods goodnes and the valiance and wiſdome of her Noble and faithfull Subiects, the ſame was notably made fruſtrate, And becauſe her Maieſty hath good intelligence of perſect amity with all Kings and Princes of Chriſtendome, ſeuing with the King of Spaine, to be both this many yeeres moſt vniouſly proſeſſed openly great amity by diuers allians, both againſt her Royall perſon and her people, and countries, without any ſuch cauſe firſt giuen on her Maieſties part: Therefore wee the ſaid Earle, and Lord Admirall doe ſerueſſe all perſons, that wee are moſt ſtrictly com-manded by her excellent Maieſty, to forbear from offeſding in that our voyage of any manner of perſons of what Nation ſoever, except the ſaid Kings Naturall Subiects, or ſuch other borne Strangers, as ſhall come to the ſaid King moſt wiſely and with men, ſhippes, artillery, vellell, and other to other promiſes for ſuſtenance of her Maieſty, which her Maieſties commendaement wee are bounden to obſerue, and doe therefore give ſtrict charge to all perſons, that ſhall ſerue in this Maieſties vnderneath vs, vpon paine of extreme puniſhment to obſerue the ſame; yet to auoid all exceſſes that may breed queſtion, who they are, being now the King of Spaines Subiects that ſhall be charged by vs, to be moſt wiſely ſidered for the ſuſtaining and ſeruing vpon of the ſaid King's Forces, provided either by land or ſea, to attempt any inuaſion of her Maieſties countries: Wee doe for the liquidation of this doubt, partly in Gods name, require and charge all perſons, that are not the ſaid Kings naturall Subiects, and yet that haue giuen bond with their ſhippes, vellell and munition as aforeſaid, to withſtand all their ſaid ſhippes prepared for the warre, and all their promiſes of helpfull out of any Kingdom of Spaine or Portugal, or from the company and ſervice of the Kings ſhippes againſt our Nauy; and therewith to returne either to their owne Countries, or if they ſhall like to come to our Nauy, to whom, in the reuerend name of our Sovereign Lady the Queene Maieſty, wee doe promiſe all ſecurity, both for their perſons and goods, to be eſcorted and defended as friends, and to ſuffer all their ſhippes and promiſes, that were taken by the King of Spaine, or intended for his ſervice, or that ſhall be by the Queene withdrawn from her aide, to remaine in their free diſpoſitions, ſo as the ſame be eſcorted in all ſorts as friends; and not as enemies to the Queene Maieſty, and to us her Generalls: and if any ſhall upon knowledge of this her Maieſties moſt honourable Order, and of our promiſe (to be the ſame as ſanctiſed by wee may) willingly and manfully reſuſe to accept this our offer, and ſhall not endure themſelves to performe this reaſonable requiſt, tending to their good and liberty, wee ſhall then bee ſuſtained, as by the law of armes wee may, to take and ſeize all ſuch for reſuſing this our offer, as manfully aiders of the King of Spaine with forces to invade her Maieſties Dominions, and ſo manfully enemies: and in ſuch caſe of that reſuſal, if any harme ſhall happen by any attempt on ſide their Perſons, ſhippes and goods, by any our blame, for the aiding of the ſaid King: there ſhall be no inſt cauſe for them hereafter to complaine, or to procure their Naturall Princes and Lords to ſollicit reſtitutions or amends for the ſame, and for the more ſatisfaction herof, wee haue thought good to haue the Originall herof to be ſigned with our hands and with our Seales, to be ſent by any that will require to read or for the ſame: And likewiſe wee have put the ſame in French, Italian, Dutch and Spaniſh, and haue alſo cauſed the ſame to be diſtributed into as many Ports of Spaine and Portugal as conveniently might be for the better knowledge to be had in the ſaid Ports, alſo in all other Portes vnder his ſubjection.

(263) Theſe things premied, Euenneſe of her Maieſties Ships Royall, three of the Lord Admirall's, foure and twenty of the States Shipper, Marchants Men of Warre, and Viſcanders above one hundred, in alto the number of one hundred and fifty ſaile, in the beginning of May met at Plumouth, where ſuch lawes were ordained for the true ſervice of God, and iuſtice in the Army, as it ſeemed rather a Regiment of Civil Academiſts, then a Rendezvous of Souldiers: and her Maieſty likewiſe in the Court, at Henrich in the Temple, opened her heart vnto the Lord in this wiſe.

My ſonnet ſent Maieſty, and Guider of the Worlds Maieſty, that moſt ſearcheth and ſademeth the bottome of our hearts conſcient, and in them ſeeth the true Originals of all our allians intruded: thou that by thy ſearchſt doſt truly diſcerne how no man's reſentment can quietneſſe of inuirtue, nor deſire of blood-ſhed, nor greedynſſe of inuirtue hath bred the reſolution of our new ſet in Army, but a boundſſe care and wary watch, that no neglect of ſeſſe, nor over-ſurety of haue might breed either danger to vs, as glory to them: theſe being the grounds wherevnto thou doſt inſpire the mind; wee humbly beſeech thee with boundſſe care, proſper the works, and with thy ſword guide the way ſped the victory, and make the returne the advancement of thy glory the triumph of their ſeue, and ſurety to the Realme, with the leaſt drop of the Engliſh blood. Thy deſert petitions Lord giue thou thy bleſſed Grant.

and were in the Du-Rapelle; both of them ioinie her Maieities Lieutenants General for this service, by Sea and by land. The Vice-Admirall was the Lord Thomas Howard, shipped in the Méandre, and the Rear-Admirall, Sir Walter Raleigh, in the Warre-Spites; and for the States was Admirall, Jan Van Duinenoord, who served in the Neptune, a Shippe of foure hundred Tunnes, and accordingly the whole Fleet was divided into five squadrons, with a commandement that every squadron should attend his Admirall, & every one of these had his Vice-Admirall assigned. Of the first was Sir Robert Southwell in the Leone, of the second, Sir Francis Vere in the Ramcham; the third Sir Robert Dudley attending the Lord Thomas Howard, in the Nem-Pareille; the fourth, Robert Crosse following Sir Walter Raleigh in the Swiss-fure; and the last was, Jan Gerbrantzen, Vice-Admirall of the Hollanders.

(265) For the Land-service besides the Generalls, were Sir Francis Vere, Lord Marhall: Sir John Wingfield Campe-maister General: Sir Courtes Clifford, Sergeant Major, Sir George Carow, Master, of the Ordnance: John Backe Prouoft Marhall: Oliver Lambert, Quarter-Maister, and Roger Afley, Secretary. The Colonels of the Army were the Earle of Suffex, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Sir Richard Wintfield, and Sir Edward Wintfield of the Volantiers, and for the Dutch, was the Count Lodowick, in all about ten thousand men. The priuate Counsell for this expedition being selected, certain instructions were sent sealed to every shippe, with a commandement to the Captain, not to break them open, till such time as they came to the South-Cape, vntill they happened to bee liuered from the Fleece by storme or mischance, but if taken by an enemy, then to caſt them oer-board.

(266) Thus ready for Seas, vpon the first of Iune a warning Peeces being shot off, all weyed Anchors, and with a gallant flew, and full gales followed the Lord Admirall, but the shippe feasting before they past Carrall, they were enforced backe into the Sound, where staying two dayes, vpon the thirde the winde came about, and with a prosperous Gale brought them to Cape Saint Vincent, where an Irish Barke was met with from Cadix, which signified the strength of the Towne, and the shipping that lay in the Bay, to witte, twenty Gallies, ninety Sailes of Shippes, whereof five were of those great Gallions, which are called the Kings twelve Apostles, (all doubtlesse the sonnes of Thunder) two great Gallies, three Frigates, three Argolies, twenty Balaikes; the rest were Merchants Shippes, rich, and of great burden, whose ladings were musicon, come, oyle, wine, waxe, silke, cloth of gold, and quicke-silver, some bound for the Indians, some for Bretaine, some for Lisbone, and some for other places: Newes most acceptable vnto the Generalls, who halting thitherwards, vpon Sunday the twentieth of Iune, assailed the Frigate of Saint Sebastian, on the west side of Cadix, to land their men, but the place strong, and the Seas going high, their purpose was hindered.

(267) May I relate with hope of credite what others haue reported vpon their owne eye-sight? At the first approach of this Reynall Navy before Cadix, a faire Douce (a fortunate Presage) becomes in the morning, is said to haue lighted vpon the Mayne-yard of the Lord Admirall ship, and there to haue layd quietly the space of three howres, every man gazing, but no man suffered to harme her: as also the last day of their departure thence, another Douce presented her self in the same Order, and in the same shippe, growing wonderfully tame and familiar with the men, and so continued with them till they came into England.

(268) The day following their approach, being the first of the weeke, the Spanish ships in the road, in number fifty nine, attended with twenty Gallies, by the aduise of their Admirall, shot with the tide within the point of Maine-land, vnto Castile Puntall, and in the strates of the Baye, forced themselves in good order, and of a reasonable distance, as well to offend the enemy, as to relieue each others inter-changeably.

(269) The Bay was narrow whereunto they had entered, full of Rocks, shelves, & lands, which notwithstanding it was in Counsell determined, that the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carow, and Sir Robert Southwell, with some Londoners, and a Squadron of the Low-Country shippe, should beguine the fight; which was most valiantly attempted, maintained, & continued, the thundring shot battering their bulks, and renting their shrowes.

(270) In the heere whereof, the Earle of Essex, (in Counsell appointed to keepe the Maine battell) vpon the sodaine from Port Saint Maries side, thrust himselfe forme into this Sea-fight, which the other Generall perceiuing, and the Arke-Royal too wuvely for that narrow water,ooke into his Pinnefle, and forwarded the fight to the end: Meane while the Gallies were assailed by Sir John Wintfield, who with his small Shippes so handled their sides, as they were forced to creepe by the Shore, and so got passage at the Bridge, contrary to the expectation of the English, whose eyes were euer ayming at the fairest Marke, which indeed was the Philip, so battered with Boilers that hee beggan to flanger, and gine ouer fight; whose souldiers seeking to save themselves by water, and swimming, let this Apostle (their Admirall) on fire, by whose example, the Saint Thomas, another of Spains Apostles did the like, haile the English should tread them in triumph of their victory. The rest of the Spanish Fleet ranne themselves on ground in the Bay of Port Beale, to gaine some breathing time from their still following peruerses.

(271) These seruices thus forwarded, the Earle of Essex forthwith landed his men vnder the Blockhouse Puntall, about a mile westward from Cadix, whence it was thought expedient to send home Regiments to the Bridge on the West of the land, to impeach all incoorts that should come from the Maine: To which seruice were sent Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard (now Lord Gerrard) and Sir Courtes Clifford with a power of twelue hundred strong. Meane while the Generall Essex with the Earle of Suffex, Count Lodowick, Lord Herbert, Lord Bark, Sir George Carow (now Lord Carow) and others took towards Cadix.

(272) The side of their enurance was fortified with a Wall through the necke of the Promontory from sea to sea, and a Counterskarpe raised some distance, where were built two Bulwarks, and a Curaine for the stronger defence of the Town, the enemy having also an advantage from the higher ascent, played sore vpon the English to their great annoyance, inso much that the forme began to gine backe from the Gate, which the Earle of Essex perceiuing, to engage his souldiers resolutions, caught his owne Colours and cast them ouer the Wall into the Towne, giuing withall a most hotte assault vnto the Gate, where to save the honour of their Esfigne, happy was hee that could first scape downe from the Wall, and with shote and sword make way through the thickest presse of the enemy. The Towne thus surprised, the Lord Admirall halted to second the charge, when a hotte encounter ensued; for the streets were very narrow, so as but two could march on breast, and from their flat roofed houses, heapes of stones were rumbled downe, to the great hurt of many of the English, who needlesse drewe the enemy before them into the Market place, where the worthy Sir John Wintfield, sore wounded at the Gate in his thigh, was shotte with Musket from a loope-hole of the Caille into the head, and presently died.

(273) But the Towne and Caille sarien fired, a the Water sides, to see them shipped without hurt or violence.

(274) Therich Bishoppe of Cadix being taken Prisoner, without any ransom was released, and all other of sacred Orders or Habits suffered without touch to depart: such was the herowall Clemency of these most noble and truly-English Generals, to the great glory of our Nation, as the Spaniards themselves were forced to confesse. The Town thus won, the spoile thereof was given to the English Captains and Soldiers, the wearing clothes of the inhabitants onely excepted, and the Citizens compounding with the Lords General, to pay an hundred and twenty thousand Ducats for their ransom, were suffered to depart: for payment whereof, forty of the chiefest Citizens, Cavaliers, Clergy-men, and Merchants, were brought pledged into England till the money was paid.

(275) The like accord was attempted by the Shippes which had ruine themselves on ground, whose number was about fifty two, many of them Merchants and all most richly laden, as might seeme by the offers they made; for no lesse then two millions and a halfe of Ducats were offered by them for the redemption: but the LL. Generals more minding honour and the fraize they came for, would heare of no composition but for the Merchants ships onely, which while it was in trausit too and fro, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, Admirall of Spain, commanded them all together to bee set on fire, which was suddainly done: and the flames terribly mounting, forced the pitchy smoke, as thickes cloudes to darken the Aire. Amongst else were two of the Spanish Shippes, the Matibon and the Andres; the first of which was saved by the Lord Admirall's direction, and the second was quenched by Sir Thomas Grenerall, in whose bottom himselfe returned for England.

(276) Thus in an instant, a Fleet, full of men, marchandize, victuall, armour, & twice a hundred peces of Ordinance, all valued by themselves, at twelve Millions of Ducats, was suddenly lunked, consumed or taken; the Towne also ransacked, every Soldier bringing some portion of her rich spoiles into England, to shew the service he performed at Cadix. The Towne they burnt, felling the Churches onely: the Walles they battered, and Towers demolished, the Island it selfe they burned, razed and spoiled, laying all waste before them, and leaving the rubbish to declare the ruines which the English had made.

(277) Vpon the fift of Iuly the Earle of Essex with his, abandoned Cadix, the Lord Admirall being gone on board some sixe dayes before, and the next day the whole Fleet set saile Westward towards Faro a Towne in Algarve, where the Earle desirous to doe some further exploit upon the terrafirma of Spain, landed his men (the Lord Admirall on board securing the sea) and marching to Faro hee found it empty of men, the Inhabitantes being fledde with much of their substance, and the Towne left delicuate of victuall: yet in the Nunnery and in the Bishoppes Palace, some goods were found, and in the Library Bookes valued at a thousand Markes, and among other prizes of note, the finest Calverin the King of Spain had, was there found, and seized vpon; the English foraged the Countrey for 3 leagues about, and burnt the towne Leña without any resistance.

(278) Thence the first of August the LL. Generals fell before the Graue, where lying no shippes flurring, and the Seas altogether cleared; vpon the seventh of the same month they safely and very richly arrived at Plimouth, to the great honour of England, glory of their Queene, and renouew of their owne valours and famous aduencures.

(279) But as the wrongs offered by the Spaniards, seemed to the English farre greater then was yet the reuenge: to allo the most prudent Queene held it still fitt to finde King Philip more work at home, and therefore a third voyage was undertaken the yeere following, whereof Robert Earle of Essex was made as well Lord General for the Land, as Admi-rall for the sea; hazing for the one service, his Frater Admirall, the Lord Thomas Howard, a Knight of the Order, and his Fret-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Captaine of the Guard; for the other, his Lieutenant General was Charles Lord Monten Knight of the Order; his Marshall, Sir Francis Fort Coronell General of the Low-Countries Forces; Sir George Carew Lord President of Alston, Master of his Ordinance; and Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Serpent Master of the field. The whole number consisted of fiftie thousand men, besides Mariners, for which an hundred and twenty shippes were furnished, whereof seuenteene were her Maiesties, sixty men of Warre, the rest for victuall and transportation. These vpon the ninth of Iuly were embarked at Plimouth for the Ilands of Azores, and hazing cleared fifty Leagues fell fowle by a Tempest, and were driven backe againe to Plimouth, and against these set saile vpon the 17. of August next following.

(280) Vpon the sixteenth of September they fell with the Isles Flores, Fuernes, Fogall, and Frisal which submitted themselves to the Lord Generals deuotion; whence weying their Anchors, they made saile for Saint Michaels and there before the Towne caile them againe, where it was determined that Sir Walter Rawleigh should keep the sea, while the Lord Generall with two thousand should land elsewhere in the Island; which they did, and lacked the rich town Palla Frances: but the seas going high, and the Winters stormes approaching, after the spoile of those places, the destruction of a Carracke richly laden with Sugars, fired by her owne men, the taking of a Brazil man, and the surprize of three prizes which they brought into England, valued at foure hundred thousand Ducats, they returned, the Spaniards every where hazing the world.

(281) These successes on the seas brought yet further mischeifs on the Spaniards, by hindring the tra-fficke of Marchandize, as well for their owne trade & commerce with others, as for others trading into Spain among whom England, the young and new elected King of Polonia, found himselfe most agreed: whose Ambassador forthat businesse into the Queene, was one Paulus de Laine, a Polonia Gentleman, learned, eloquent, and very audacious, (if not over-much) who bringing letters of credence from his King, had audience at Greenwich, her Maiefty sitting vnder her cloath of Estate, and with her Nobles, attending the summe of his message, which the Polonian beganne with more then an ordinary Grace.

(282) Whose reuour was filled with blais of discontent, conceiued by his potent Master the King of Polonia, and cauled by the greunances of his Mar-chants, who not onely were deprived of some priledges in England, but the sea which is made free by the Omnipotent Ropped, and the trades of his Mar-chants into Spain by her Highnes Edicts debarred, contra y to the law both of Nature & of Nation; that his Maiefty as he could not be moued to diminish a ny part of his love towards her Maiefty, so yet could hee not but relieue his owne subiects; and the rather for that it touched all his Nobility, whose reuences consisted chiefly vpon the Trade of Marchandizing.

quite, though her Maieſty well knew, of meanes he had no want; and now had ſent to aduerſe her Highneſſe in ſilencing manner by him his Ambaſſador, ſeeing that his letters to that purpoſe heretofore ſent, had not bene regarded, in whole name he now required, that the ſras might be open, a reſtitution made, and the Trade Weſtward to Spaine bee free, according to equity; otherwiſe his Maſter would no longer neglect his Subiects Offes, but would take in hand a meanes of redreſſe. As for her Maieſties warre with Spaine, that ought not to hinder Nauigation by the common Law of Nature (as hee auaunced) nor, for her perfect ſhould the ancient frienſhip betwixt the potent Poloniau and the mighty King of Spaine bee broken, nor with the houſe of Auſtria, whole daughter his Prince had now married, which bound him in a double band of looe. But her truſted (his Maſters requiſt beaſing ſuch equity) her Maieſty would regard it, and command ſatisfaction of theſe things forthwith to bee made, to the content of his Prince, and ſafety of her ſelfe, which thing hee wiſhed, & therof warned her Maieſty. And with other like wordes ended as preſumptory as he beganne.

(283.) Vnto which confident Oration, the Queen her ſelfe not brooking to be beated by any Prince in the World, preſently made aſwerre, preſenting the Lord Chanceller therein who was about to doe it, and both roundly and learnedly in the Latine (the ſame language wherein the meſſage was deliuered) replied: the very wordes as ſerue as could bee taken from her mouth were theſe.

(284.) Hen quā in decepta fui. Expeſſani Nūquā i ter veris querelam mihi adduxiſti; per literas te accepiſſe legimus, te veris Heraldum inueni. Nunquā in uita ſicem Orationem audiui. Miror ſine moro, ſancum & tam conſultum in publico audacum; neque paſſi ſi Rex tunc adeſſet, talia uerba protuliſſet: Sed aliquid tale tibi in machinatu commiſiſſe (quod quidem ualde dubium) te tribuendum, quā cum Rex ſit iuuenis, & non tam tute Sanguinis quam Eleſtorum; atque etiam nouitior deſine, non tam bene percipiat quā ueteri Reges conueni, quā Adaiues ſui ſubſidium obſeruant, & alij forte decepti obſeruant. Rēd as te attinet, uideris multo liberior perſeſſe, libet tamen Principum non attingere, neque intelligere quid inter Reges conueni. Cum uero tua Natura & Gentium conuenientia, Hoc ſcio eſſe mi natura & Gentium, ut cum bellum inter Reges intercedat, licet alteri alterum uindicta allet Praſidia intercipere, & ne in damnum ſuum conuertantur, prauidere: Hoc ſcio eſſe tua Natura, & Gentium; Vbi ſtudem Dominum Auſtriam narras (quam tam leni facis) non te lateat ex eadem Deo non deſuiſſe qui Regnum Polonia regi tuo intercipere uoluſſet. De reliquis quæ cum malis ſunt, & ſingulariter deliberanda, non ſunt boni loci as temporis, acceperis quā quibdam Conſiliariis hinc reſi deſignatis deliberandum fuerit. Interum uale & quicquid.

(285.) Oh how was I deceived! I looked for an Embaſſage, but thou haſt brought me complaints; I vnderſtood by thy letters that thou wert a Legate, but I finde thee an Herald; neuer ſine I drew breath heard I ſuch an Oration. I maruail truly, I maruail as ſo great and thick vnacquainted boldneſſe in ſo publicke an aſſembly; neither doe I think it the King thy Maſter were preſent, that hee would ſay ſo much: but if peraduenture he hath committed any ſuch thing to thy charge (which ſurely I do much doubt) it is to be imputed vnto him, that where the King is of yeers vnrife, and not by blood, but by election (yea and not newly aduanced) hee doth not ſo perfectly vnderſtand the courſe of negotiating theſe kind of affairs with other Princes, which either his Anceſtores haue obſerued with vs, or perhaps others will obſerue, who afterwards ſhall ſucceede him. As touching thy ſelfe, indeede thou ſeemeſt to mee to haue read many Bookes, but not to haue peruſed the Bookes of Princes affaires, but vnto thee to bee ignorant what is conuenient amongst Kings. And whereas thou makeſt mention of the Law of Nature and Nature know that this is the Law both Naturall and Nationall, that when Warre is waged among Princes, it is lawfull for one of them to intercept the military helpes of the other, brought from what place ſocuer, ſo to prevent the harms which might otherwiſe redound on himſelfe: And this againe I ſaue to bee the Law of Nature and Nation. Whereas likewiſe thou mentioneſt a new affinity with the houſe of Auſtria, which now thou makeſt ſo famous, and of ſo deare eſteeme, forget not Sir, that there haue bene of that houſe that would haue beneſit the Kingdom of Polonia from thy King. As for other points which bee not to be ſpoken off at this place, and time, becauſe they are many and ſeverally to be conſidered of one after another: thou ſhalt waite for ſuch further aſwerre as ſhall bee reſolued on by ſome of my Councell, to whom I will affigne the conſideration of this matter: In the meane time farewell and be quiet. And thus Lion-like riſing, daunted the malapert Orator no leſſe than her ſuavely poſt and maieſticall departure, then with the carnelſe of her princely checkes: and turning to the Train of her Attendants, thus ſaid; Gods death my Lords (for that was her oath euer in anger) I haue bene enforced this day to ſcower vp my old Latine, that hath lain long in ruſhing.

(286.) To entreat a Peace betwixt theſe Chriſtian Princes of England and Spaine, the King of Denmarke likewiſe did ſend an Embaſſage vnto Queene Elizabeth, as alſo to deliuer the Garter worae by his Predeceſſor lately departed this world, with an earnest entreaty to continue the amity betwixt theſe two Realmes. The man was Arnold wriſfield Chanceller of Denmarke, iudicious, learned, and wiſe, who with ſarre better temper and tearms well couched, deliuered his oration; which ended, hee moſt humbly propounded certain requiſts (whereunto her Maieſty preſently replied) which in effect were theſe.

(287.) 1. That the League of peace confirmed betwixt the Crownes of England & Denmarke might be continued as formerly it had bene in the late deceased Kings dayes & other his Predeceſſors, which now the preſent King his Maſter did infinitely deſire: To which hee answered: that he was moſt willing thereunto, wiſhing that the now King would proſeſſe the ſame amity to worke then his Predeceſſors had done.

2. That whereas much Chriſtian blood was ſpilt in theſe continuall warres betwixt England & Spaine, it would pleaſe her Maieſty to giue her conſent, that the King his Maſter might make a motion of Peace; and as hee found the occaſion, ſo to proceede. Whereunto hee replied, that ſhee thought his King was too young, and vnexperienced, to conſider thoroughly the cauſe of breach betwixt her and Spaine; and as the League had not bene broken on her part, or with her roiall conſent, ſo an accord ſhould not be ſought after by her, nor by any in her behaile, for (quoth hee) I would haue the King of Denmarke & all Princes Chriſtian and Heathen to know, that England hath no need to craue Peace; nor my ſelfe endued one haires ſcare ſince I attained the Crowne thereof, being guarded with ſo valiant and ſauiſhall aduice.

3. His third requiſt was, if it ſtood with her Maieſties good liking, to permit open traffique, that the Marchants of Denmarke might tranſport their goods into Spaine without danger on the narrow ſeas as heretofore ſome of them had ſuſtained to their great loſſe. Her Maieſties aſwerre was, that it was to her vnknowne, that any of his Maſters good Subiects were in any wiſe moleſted, or their goods ſtayed, and that vpon laſt prooſe thereof made, a redreſſe ſhall bee ordained, to the full ſatisfaction of the King, and content of his Subiects.

4. Laſtly, hee was to retorne the Garter, (where-with her Maieſty had honoured the late deceased King) as the manner is of forraigne Princes to doe, which hee with great reſouſence there deliuered;

Which her Maieſty accepting, yet told him, there was right ſorry to receive it, for thereby ſhe was put in mind of the loſſe of a moſt Noble Brother, & a moſt loving friend. But how ſooner the Danish Merchants now complained of loſſe, the Engliſh Marchandize were arreſted in the Sound, for releaſe whereof, Ambaſſadors were ſent into Denmark, where a reſtitution was made by the King, with ligh honour and bounty as well ſatisfied her Maieſty, and contented her Marchants.

(1285) But a more dangerous Agent, working for Spain, was the ſmith Tir-Oss, who ſerpent-like lay lurking upon his advantage to raiſe the Standard of Rome, and to diſſert ſubjection from the Engliſh Crowne. This mans fortunes were hence ſome time declared, how being the ſonne of a Ballard, or a baniſhed ſugitive, he was raiſed by her Maieſties mee bounty to the dignitie of an Earle, and ſtood in authority ranked with the beſt; not ſo only, but being twice in danger of the capital crimes (once for a murder, next for viſſurping the Title of O-King) upon better hopes, of her princely clemency, twice got pardon for his life. The times now dangerous, and Ireland too ready to receive ſo ſortaine powers, it was thought convenient to employ Sir John Norris (that famous Warriour) into thoſe parts, with thirteenth hundred of the Netherland old Souldiers, newly retired from the wars in Britaine.

(1289) Hugh Baron of Dungannon, now Earle of Tir-Oss, fearing leaſt the Engliſh would make their neſts, where himſelf meant to build, namely in ſome Caſtle, at the mouth of Lough Erne, ſuddenly aſſailed the fort of Black-Water, by which the entry lay into his Country, and got it by ſurrender. Which done, he wrote to Andover, to ſide with him againſt his wrongs received of the Lord Deputy; yet at the ſame inſtant, to Sir John Norris (appointed Lord General) that her might be mildly dealt with, and not be driven headlong upon the dangerous rocks of diſſolality.

(1290) But how his loyalty ſlood affected unto her Maieſty (his raiſer) was well perceived by the powers which he retained about him, being alwaies guarded with a thouſand horſemen, and fixe thouſand two hundred and foureſcore foot of Irish, beſides two thouſand three hundred of Connaught, which ever lay ready at his command; whereupon all of them being proclaimed Traitors, the flames of rebellion beganne more violently to burſt forth, which for a long time, and not without loſſe of much blood could hardly be quenched: for though the Lord General were not inferior in ſtrength of men, yet the advantages of the enemy were ſuch, that the time was rather ſpent in taking of ſhooties, and triſſuolous Parties, then in any memorable exploit; the one part waiting for ſitter opportunities, and the other looking every day for his promiſed ſuccours from Spain.

(1291) But to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian blood Queen Elizabeth who ever minded Mercy more then Justice, ſent her Treasurer & Chiefe Juſtice of that Kingdome, as her Commiſſioners to conſult with this diſcontented Earle, and others his adherents, before whom, Tir-Oss complained of wrongs offered him by Sir Henry Bagnall Mareſhall, as well to the prejudice of his eſtate, as of his eſtimate with the Queene, the Lord Deputy, Lord General, and others, and therupon exhibited a Petition in humble maner containing theſe requiſts. That himſelf and all his followers might be pardoned of their crimes, and be reſtored to their former eſtates; that they might freely exerciſe their Romiſh Religion without moleſtation; that no Garriſon Souldiers, Shiſſe, or other Officer ſhould interdeale within the iuriſdiction of his Earledome; that the Company of fifty horſemen with the Queenes pay might be reſtored to him, in the ſame State as formerly hee had leaſed them; that the ſpoiles of his Country, and people might be puniſhed, and that Sir Henry Bagnall ſhould pay him a thouſand pound promiſed in Dowry with his ſiſter, whom Tir-Oss had married, and who was now deceased. Others likewiſe laid out their grievances conceived; ſuch were O-Danell, Brian Mac-Hugh-Oss, Mac Mahon, and Earl Mac-Carley, who received moſt reaſonable anſwers to all their demands.

(1292) But unto them the Commiſſioners likewiſe propoſed certain Articles; That they ſhould forthwith lay downe their Armes, diſperſe their Forces, acknowledge ſubmiſſively their diſſolality, admit the Queenes officers in their Governments, reſtore the Forts they had deſaced, ſuffer the Garriſons to liue without diſturbance, make reſtitutions of ſpoiles taken, conſeſſe upon their oath how farre they had dealt with ſortaine Princes, and ſiſnally to renounce all ſortaine aide. But their propoſitions not pleaſing the palate of thoſe Rebels, they departed with a reſolution to maintain their owne demands. Which moved Norris the General aided with the Lord Deputy to march with his Army unto Armagh where hee approch (with dreadfull to his enemies) when Tir-Oss heard of, in great perplexity hee forſooke the Fort of Black-Water, ſet on fire the villages about, and plucked downe the Towne of Dungannon, with part of his owne houſe, bewailing his eſtate becauſe recovery, & was ſo much deſtined in mind, as hee ſought ſomething elſe but whate to lade his rebellious head.

(1293) The Country now wailed, and no victuals to be had, Norris for a Garriſon in the Church of Armagh, ſtrengthened Monahan, and proclaimed Tir-Oss Traitor in his owne territories. Which done, hee ſtayed in Irish without any great deeds of martiall importance, only Tir-Oss to gaine time preſented unto him a ſubmiſſion, ſigned with his owne hand, call himſelfe downe (a rare and vncouth ceremony) at the Queenes pictures feet, vngirt his ſword, and craved pardon upon his knees: and yet in the meane time dealt hee for aides out of Spain, and ſo far preſented, as that Meſſengers were ſent from King Philip, with expulations that the King of Spain at a time preſent ſhould ſend them a competent Army to ioin with the Irish, that all conditions of peace with the Engliſh ſhould be teſſed, and that the Rebels ſhould be furniſhed with munition from Spain.

(1294) Hereupon (though there was a ceſſation from Armes) hee fell to harry and waite the Country, to burne villages, to drive away booties, and hauing done what hee could or would, as it were pricked in conſcience, hee once againe put on the viſard of ſimulation, and ſued for pardon and peace: which the better to effect, hee ſent the letters of King Philip promiſes unto the Lord Deputy with the cauſes of his owne diſcontents, which moved him to doe what hee did. And ſurely ſuch was his dextera, or his Deſtiny, or the Engliſh no leſſe dangerous, then frequent ſcuria, negligence and confidence, or the ſparing of money by the grand diſburſers, or the inbred lenity of the too-clement King that his faire wordes were euer beleued, and his foule offences pardoned: but whole fault ſeuer, moſt of Connaught was now reſolved, all Irish rebellious, onely ſeuen Caſles kept for the Queene.

(1296) The Lord Deputy no ſooner had received the ſword, and taken the charge of the Kingdome of Ireland, but hee made forward to meeſt with the Rebels, holding it good policy to cut off delays, which which commonly increase the abilities of the enemy. Tir-oen on the other side, as boldly made his resistance, and in a dangerous service encountered him at the Moory, where the Lord Barragh by his valour made the way, and most valiantly waite the Fort of Blackwater, (repaired and reinforced by the Rebels) the only strength (besides Woods) that the Tir-oen had. To relieve this Piece, immediately the enemy threw himselfe: against whom Henry Earl of Kildare presently marching with a Company of horse, and certain volunteers, (gentlemen of the better sort) where he discovered the enemy, though with losse of some men of note; as of Francis Vaughan, brother to the Lord Deputies wife, Robert Turner Sergeant Major, and the two Foster-brothers of the Earle Kildare, whose deaths here toooke, as within few daies after himselfe died for very griefe.

(297) The Fort reinforced with men and munition, and the Lord Deputy upon service in other parts; Tir-oen now wavering betwene hope, feare, and shame, thought best to assay it by siege, as the place of greatest importance to further his designs; for that losse, hee saw his fortunes must downe, and thereupon with his strongest power, he beleaguered it. The Lord Deputy hearing thereof, prepared straightway to relieve the place, and marching with full pace and assurance of victorie, whether through too forward a minde, distemperature of body, aine, or of bogges, arrested hee was with sickness, and violently cut off, by untimely death, leaving to her Maistie a misse in her Irish Estate, and a further security to the ranging rebelles.

(298) The government of Ireland was then committed to the Earle of Ormond vnder the Title of Lieutenant Generall of the Armie, and vnto the Lord Chancellor Sir Robert Gardiner; vnto whom Tir-oen (after his accustomed manner) in a long letter recapitulated his great grievances, leaving not out the least offence of the Souldiers, or actions of the Sheriffs; his breach of covenants with Sir John Morris hee coldly excuseth, and laid his complaints against his enemies (the English) who had intercepted and suppressed his submission to the Queene, that they had raised intolerable impositions vpon the Nobles, and Commons; and that the revenues of Ireland was flured among Counsellors, Lawyers, Souldiers, and Noaries; by which and other like occurrences, it was manifest that hee intended to extirpate the English quite out of Ireland.

(299) All this while his Siege lay before the Fort of Blackwater; for the raising whereof, Sir Henry Barragh (the bitterest enemy that Tir-oen euer had) with fourteen Englishes of the choicest troopers were sent, who on the Earle met nere vnto Armagh, and being egged on with a free will desire of revenge, bent all his force against the Marshall, where he beganne a bloody conflict, and was continued with the death of that worthy Souldier (fighting amongst the thickest) whereby Tir-oen obtained not onely a ioyous triumph over his private enemy, but withall was crowned with a glorious victory over the English, who neuer since they first set footing in Ireland received so great an overthrow: for therein thirteen valiant Captaines lost their liues, fifteene hundred common Souldiers were rowted and put to shamefull flight, disparted and cut in peeces. Vpon this disaster the Garrison Souldiers (hauing with loyal hearts and weapons in hand, vnto extreme famine and exceeding distress, held out to the last) lastly surrendered the Piece of Blackwater vnto the Rebels; by which overthrow and surrender, the Irish became furnished with armour and munition to maintain their warres, and Tir-oen renowned all the Realme over, as their onely Hammer, and founder of their freedom.

(300) Himselfe over-joyed with these gotten victories, swelled about measure with an haughty arrogancy, commanding all things as sole Monarch of Ireland. Into Munster hee sent Owen McCarthy-O-More with four thousand preying rogues, to forrage the Country, and the rable thus daily resorted vnto them, burned the houses of the English, ransacked their substance and killed very many; James Fitz-Thomas one of the family of the Desmonds they let vp as Earle of Desmond, yet so, that hee should hold as Tenant in Fee of the O-Neele, (the Earle of Tir-oen) and thus after a moneth, when they had kindled this fire and set Munster in a flame, they returned laden with rich booties and spoile. Tir-oen in the meane time had sent his letters to King Philip of Spaine, wherein hee founded his victories with a full trumpet, assuring him that hee would heare of no peace with the English, were the conditions neuer so indifferent, and would for his part insouly keepe his promises with the Spanish King.

(301) In this desperate estate flood Ireland when Queene Elizabeth chose Robert Earle of Essex, to bee Lord Lieutenant and Governour General thereof: a Peere in regard of his approued wisdom, fortitude, and fidelity, thought best to repaire the detriments and losses therein sustained, and in such duee clemencie with his Soueraigne, and intire loue of the people, as the heuens seemed to haue framed him for the delight of man. In whom shined all sparkles of true Nobility and Martiall honor, had not fortune marred all that the other graces had made. His commission was large, and authority, and led no lesse then twenty thousand compleat Souldiers, whereof sixteen thousand were foot, and the rest horse-men, so well furnished and provided, as the like had neuer before leaue before in Ireland.

(302) Thus honourably accompanied with the flower of English Gallants, and well-wishing acclamations of the people, with a strange thunder-clap in a cleere Sunne-shine day, hee set forward from London, and arriving in Ireland received the Sword, where (toward the end of March) falling in counsell touching his affaires, it was thought fittest by wife Stardis, that Munster should be cleared of those petty Rebels lying acceer, and of more validity then the remote Villages of small weale and lesse account. Whereupon, contrary to his owne opinion formerly deliuered (whiles hee was in England) and his directions from her Maistie, in Ireland hee made first into Munster, and became terrible vnto the Rebells of those parts, chasing them before him into the woods, and so cleared that Province, with more expence of time, and losse of men, then was heere well liked by the State.

(303) Hence hee made into Leinster, against the O-Crom; and O-Mulder, who had gathered head and taken Armes against their obedience; whom in light skirmishes hee fortunately vanquished; whence hee sent Sir Conyers Clifford Governour of Connaught one way towards Ulster, whilst hee himselfe took another way, to distract the force of Tir-oen. Sir Conyers with a power of fifteene hundred troopers, marched vnto the Mountaines of Carlew, where O-Rourke and his Rebels suddenly assailed them, being out-wearied with trauell, and their powder acceer spent; in which conflict, amongst many other slaine, Sir Conyers Clifford himselfe, as also Sir Alexander Ratcliffe, sealed the testimony of their valours with the losse of their liues.

(304) The Lord Generall hearing of this overthrow, made towards Villier, and came into the frontiers as farre as Lough, where Tir-oen, on the other side of the River, from the Hilles made his Brauado. But falling into his wonted way of dissimulation, desired a parley with the Lord Lieutenant, which hee altogether reiecting, answered, that if the Earle would conferre with him, hee should find him the next morning in the head of his troops:

Blackwater againe besieged.

Tir-oen feith for Parley but is refused.

on which day, when after a tight skirmish, a horseman of Tir-ann troops, with a loud voice cried, that the Earle was not willing to fight, but to parley vpon peace with the Lord Generall; it was againe denied him. But the next day, as the Lord Lieutenant was in his March forward, one Hagan sent from Tir-ann, met him, and declared that the Earle most humbly desired to haue the Queenes mercy and peace, and withall besought, that his Lordship would be pleased to afford him audience, which if hee would grant, then would hee with all reverence attend him at the Foord of the River not farre from Louth.

(305) To this lally the Lord Lieutenant attended, and sent to discover the place, and following a troope of horse vpon the next Hill, came down alone vnto the River; Tir-ann attending on the other side, no sooner saw his approach, but forthwith rode his horse into the River vpon the saddle, and with all semblances of a dutifull respect, most reuerently saluted his Lordshippe: where, hauing had conference the space of an houre, they both returned vnto their companies. There followed the Earle of Essex, Cam, a base sonne of Tir-ann, instantly intreating in his fathers name, that certaine principall men might be admitted to a conference, whereto his honour condescended.

(306) And taking with him the Earle of Southampton, Sir George Bourchier, Sir Warham St. Leger, Sir Henry Duncans, Sir Edward Wyntfield, and Sir William Cuslyble, went to the Foord, where Tir-ann with his brother Cornet, Mac Gony, Mac Gair, Euer mac Carthy, Henry Ousington, and O-Suinn, attended their coming. And falling in conference, it was concluded that certaine Commissioners should the next day meet for a treaty of peace, and in the meane time there should be a cessation of warres, from sixe weekes to sixe weekes, untill the first of May: yet so, as it might be free on both sides, after fourteen daies warning giuen, to refuse hospitality. And if any of Tir-ann confederates would not thereto consent, to be prosecuted at the Lord Lieutenants pleasure.

(307) But howsoever these his proceedings pleased the Marshalls, yet was her Maieitie highly incensed, that looke expeditions had bene made without her directions, being informed that the Spring, Summer, and Autumme, were spent without seruice vpon the Arch-rebell, that her men were diminished, and large summes of money consumed, without doing that for which he was sent; that by this means the Rebels were encouraged, and the Kingdome of Ireland laid at hazard to bee lost: Which his defaults (for so they were apprehended) were (as hee conceived) much aggravated, by some that were hard against him, in her attentive eare; vpon which furnish her Maieities sharpe letters received (though hee had excused his seruice by others whom himselfe sent at the same season) so overpressed his troubled thoughtes, as leauing his charge to be managed by others, hee made into England, well hoping to pacifie his Soeraignes dissatisfaction from his own mouth, and at Downe with assistance of her presence, where after his first welcome, hee was commended to his chamber; and some after was committed to the custody of the Lord Keeper.

(308) No sooner almost was the Lord Generall departed Ireland, but that Tir-ann (notwithstanding the cessation from warre) drawing his forces together, addrested himselfe for the Field, vnto whom Sir William Warren was sent, to charge him with breach of promise; but he swelling in pride, peremptorily answered, that his doings were according to councell, having giuen warning before, and his cause iust, for that the Lord Lieutenant was committed in England, vpon whose honour hee repozed his whole estate; neither would hee haue any thing to doe with the Counsellors of Ire- land, in whom (as he said) he neuer found either safety or truth. And thereupon preflaming vpon Spain, and giuing it forth that there would be shortly an alteration in England; he sends O-Daniel into Connaght, receiue such comelous persons, strengtheneth the wicke, and comforteth the distrustfull, glorying euer where that he would restore againe the ancient Religion, and liberty of Ireland, and expell the English from thence; to which end, some money and munition were sent him from Spain, with Indalgenet from Rome; and (for an especiall fauour) the Pope sent him a plume of Phoenix feathers, for a trophy of his victories, as Phraus long before him sent a Coronet of Peacocks tailes vnto King Tah, when hee was first mortified Lord of Ireland.

(309) Tir-ann thus feathered for a higher flight, Peacocke like to shew his owne pride and greatness by his personall presence, vnder a religious pretext to worship a peece of the wooden Crosse of Christ, repared to bee kept in the Monastery of the holy Crosse in Tipperary, in the mid-winter would thither on Pilgrimage; whence hee sent out Mac-Gair with a number of rising robbers, to despoile and prey on the peaceable subjects; with whom Sir Warham St. Leger met, and at the first race with his Lanceranne Mac-Gair through the body, and was by him ruane through himselfe. Whereupon Tir-ann leauing more blowes, made ready to returne from Monaght sooner then was expedied, or himselfe meant.

(310) At this time Charles Blunt Lord Montjoy (afterwards created Earle of Down-flores) was lent Lord Lieutenant Generall into Ireland, who with small port and little solemnity, enured vpon the Government, the state of that Countrey lying desperately diseased, and almost past recovery. At his first coming, hearing that Tir-ann was to depart Monaght, hee haltned to stoppe his passage in Ferrel, and there to giue him Battell, which the Earle perceived by taking another way, hauing intelligence of the Lord Generals designs, but the Spring drawing on, the Deputy put himselfe on his March towards Fisher, with purpose to driue the Earle to sea, whiles Sir Henry Duncans at Lough-fale, and Sir Matthew Morgan at Rahesham plained the Garrison, which they with small adoe effected, and suppressed the Rebels in diuers overthrowes.

(311) The Lord Generall likewise held Tir-ann very hard, and with light skirmishes euer put him to the worke, so that hee now perceiving his fortune to goe backe, withdrew himselfe backe into his old corners. The Lord Lieutenant then enured into Lesfe, the place of refuge and receit of all the Rebels in Leinster, where hee flew Ouy-Mac-Kay-Og, chiefe of the family of the O-Mores, a bloody, bold, and desperate young man; and to chased out the rett of thole his raskells, as that neuer since they were seene in thole parts. And although in the commencing of these affairs the Equinox was past, and the winter weather beganne in that climate, yet marched he forward to the entrance of Mejory three miles beyond Dundalk.

(312) The passage into Fisher is euerie way naturally combersome, and this way made more by the Rebels, who had fortified and blocked vp the entrance with fences of stakes flacke in the ground, with hardies ioyned together, and floes in the midle, with ruffles of earth laid betwix hills, woods, and bogges, and manned the place with a number of Souldiers; notwithstanding, the English brake through thole Fell-fades, and beating the enemies backe, the Lord Deputy placed a Garrison eight miles from Amaghy, where in memory of Sir Tah Norru, hee named the Fort Mount-Norris: but to omit many other skirmishes in his returne, that at Carlingford was most famous, where the enemies assembled to stoppe his way, were all of them difcomforted, and put to fearful flight.

(113) In the midst of Winter hee entered the glimmes, that is, the valleys of Leinster, a secure receptacle of the Rebels, where he brought into subjection Daniel Spanish, Phelim Mac-Fegh, and the O-Toles, of whom hee tookke hostages. Then went he to Ferrell, and draue Tirrell, the most approved warrior of all the Rebels, from his faulcelife (that is his bogges and bulkes,) into Fisher; the Territory of Ferner hee had waste, spoiled Fues, and in Bresay placed a Garrison, receiving such into mercie as delivered up hostages. Which done, and the Spring approaching, he marched to Fisher, fortified Armath, and went to farre forward, that he remoued Tir-ore from the Fort of Blackwater, who had very artificially encamped himselfe there.

(114) As the Lord Generall was thus builed to reduce Ireland to obedience, so the Pope and Spain studied to hold up Tir-ore, and to maintain the rebellions; their Agents were a Spaniard, elected by the Pope, Arch-Bishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Cloyster, the Bishoppe of Killaloe, and Archer a Jesuite. These by priuer, and promises of heavenly rewards, wonne Phely to lend succours into Ireland, which forthwith hee did, vnder his Generall Don Iohn D'Aquila, a man of a conceited hope that all would bee his, as confident of much aid from the tutelar Earle Dejmond, and from Flanrent Mac-Corty, a tobell of great might; where in hee was deceived; for Sir George Curran, Lord President of Connaght, had preuented that designe, and sent them prisoners to England, where they were kept sure.

(115) Don D'Aquila with two thousand Spaniards, all of them old trained Souldiers, with certaine Irish Fugitives, landed at Kinsale in Managhter, the last of October, and straightwaies published a writing, wherein hee gloriously tiled himselfe with this Title, Major Generall, and Captain of the Catholicke King in the warres of God, for holding and keeping the faith in Ireland; in dauncing to make the world believe, that Queen Elizabeth, by the definitive sentences of the Popes, was deprived of her Kingdomes, and her subjects absolved and freed from their Oath of allegiance, and that hee was come to deliuer them out of the Diuels iawes, and the English tyrannie; upon which suggestions many discontented and wicked persons began to bandy on his side.

(116) The Lord Deputy gathering his Companies, halted to Kinsale and encamped nere vnto the Towne on the Land side, whiles Sir Richard Lemson with two of the Queenes Shippers inclosed the Haven, to forbidde all access to the Spaniards; when from both sides, the thundering Canon played vpon the Towne; but newes being brought that two thousand Spaniards more were arrived at Bere-haven, Baltimore, and Cashe-haven, Sir Richard was employed vpon them, in which seruise hee sunk fise of their Ships.

(117) Vnto these new landed Spaniards, whose Leader was Alphonso O-Campo, O-Danell ouer the ice, by speedy iourneys and unknown by-waies repaired vntoene of the English; and a few daies after Tir-ore himselfe, with O-Roch, Reinmond Burke, Ator-Mahan, Randall Mac-Sarley, Tirrell the Barron of Lixnam, and the most selected choice of all the Rebels came vnto them, who mulstered together made sixe thousand foot, and five hundred horse; all confident of victory, as being fresh, strong, and exceeding in number, where the English were out-wearied through winter siege, with scarcity of victuall, and their horse weake with fere-travail.

(118) In this hope, Tir-ore, vpon an Hill noe a mile from the English Camp, made a Braisado two daies together, intending to haue put these new supplies of Spaniards, with eight hundred Irish, by night into Kinsale, as by letters intercepted from Don D'Aquila did appeare. Which to preuent, the Lord Deputy appointed eight Ensignes to keepe watch, and himselfe with the President of Managhter, and the Marshall, at the foot of the Hill, choise out a convenient plot to giue the Earle battell, who the next morning seeing the English so forward, by his bag-pipers sounded the retreat, whom the Lord Generall followed, and forced them to stand in the bricke of a bogge, where there horsemen were disorderd and rowted by the Earle of Clan-Ri-card.

(119) The maine battell then waivering in feare; was violently charged by the Lord Deputy himselfe, who in his directions discharged the part of a worthy Commander, and in fighting, the office of a valiant Souldier; for the Rebels no able to withstand his fury, brake their armies, and in disorder confusedly fled, in whose pursuite many of them felt the reuenging edge of the English sword. Tir-ore, O-Danell, and the rest flung away their weapons, and saved their liues by flight; but Alphonso O-Campo, with three other Spanish Captaines, and sixe Ensigne-bearers, were taken prisoners, nine of their Ensignes borne away by the English, and rescued hundred of his Spaniards flames; such welcome found their new guests in Ireland. This victory obtained, both quelled the pride of the interuding Spaniards, and exceedingly daunted the hearts of the disloyall Irish; so that Tir-ore was forced into his barting holes in Fisher, O-Danell driven into Spain, and the rest of that rebellious rabble scattered into obscure places, where their best succour was to play least in fight.

(120) The Lord Generall, returning to the Siege of Kinsale, beganne to raise rampires, and to mount his Canons neerer the Towne, wherein sixe daies were spent without any impeach from the Spaniards, whose courage being cut by the losse of their fellowes, sought rather how to gette cleare and bee gone, then to aduerture resistance against such a warlike oppositor. D'Aquila hereupon, sent his letters by his Drumme Maior, to the Lord Deputy, wherein he crated, that some Gentleman of credit might bee sent into the Towne, with whom he might Parley for a peace. Whereunto his Lordship inclined, and to that end sent thither Sir William Galdolphin.

(121) Vnto whom D'Aquila signified, that hee had found the Lord Deputy, though his eager enemy, yet an honourable person; the Irish of no valor, rude and conceited, yea and (that which hee feared) perfidious and false; That hee was sent from the King of Spain to aid two Earles, and now hee much doubted whether there were any such in Retum nature, considering that one tempestuous puffe of warre had blowne the one of them into Spain, and the other into the North, so as they were no more to bee seen; willing therefore hee was to treatte about a Peace, that might bee good for the English, and not hurtfull to the Spaniards; albeit hee wanted nothing requisite to the holding out of the Siege, and expected every day out of Spain fresh supplies to funde the English work, and trouble enough.

(122) The matter thus propounded, and the English weake and weary through a long Winters siege, the Lord Deputy consented to an agreement, the Articles whereof were these.

1 That Iohn D'Aquila should quire the places which he held in the Kingdom of Ireland, aswell in the Towne of Kinsale, as the Forts and Castle of Baltimore, Berehaven, and Cashe-haven; and should deliuer them vnto the Lord Deputy, or to whom he should appoint.

2 That Don D'Aquila and his Spaniards should depart with armes, money, munition, and banners displayed, the Souldiers notwithstanding to beare no armes against the Queene of England, till such time as they were vntipped in some part of Spain.

3 That Shippes and victuals should be granted unto them in their departure, for their money, and at such reasonable prices as the Countrey could afford.

4 That if contrary winds enforced them into any other Port of Ireland, or else into England, they might be inrolled as friends with safety of harbor, and provisions necessary for their money to further their departure.

5 That a cessation should be from warre. A security from injuries, and victuall granted at reasonable rates, whiles they remained in preparing for Spain.

6 That the Ships in which they should be embarked might freely passe by other English Shippes without molestation; and the Shippes arrived in Spain, might safely returne backe without any impeachment of the Spaniards: for security whereof, the said D'Aquila should deliver for hostages, sixethree of their Captaines as the Lord Deputy would chiefe. Vnto these Articles Don Iohn solemnly swore on the behalf of the Catholike King his Master, and with his hand subscribed his name, Don Iohn D'Aquila.

(123) The troublefome cloude of most likely dangers, thus diffused in Munster faire Aire, the coasts of Ireland were shortly cleared of those foraine intruders, who notwithstanding their former great bragges, with shame and dishonour embarked themselves for home, their companies being much empaired, and proud spirits brought downe. And now the Reb-bell'd Tiron, who had boasted all Ireland was his, with fearefull flightes after he had lost most of his men, whom the swelling and violently-running Riuer, by reason of Winter floods, had swallowed vpp; where his traitors head, burdened with the dreads of his owne defects, could take no rest, no not so much as to breath without fear, distrustfull eyer shadow that hee saw, and flitting out of one hy-corner before hee well knew where to find another.

(124) Meane whiles, the Lord Deputy refreshed his weary and winter-beaten Souldiers, repoyred the decayes, and renewed the Garrisons in Munster; which done, hee departed for Dublin, where wearing out the winter stormes, towards the spring, by a gentle and easie march, well appointed, hee returned vnto Fisher, meaning to belay the Reb-bell on every side, by planting his Forts, to take him in his toils. Thus being approached vnto Blackwater, hee transported his Artie over the Foord vpon floates, vpon whose banke, beneath the old Fort, he erected a new, to such terror of the Arch-rebell, as hee fet on fire his owne house; whether the Lord Deputy immediately marched, and made spoile without any spore; the corne fields were destroyed, the Villages fired, and booties brought in on every side. The Forts in Lough Crew, Lough Rane, and Moogh Leonard, were yielded vp, and Garrisons placed in Lough Lough or Sydney, and in Managham, whence with their continual sallies, they to crossed the enemies, that firing themselves inured about, and no way open for escape, like wilde beastes they hid their heads in the thickets, forrests, and woods, muttering complaints against their late magnified Tiron; exclaiming hee had engaged the ruine of the whole Nation, for his owne private disconcor, and that these warres, howeuer beneficiall to him, yet were they most pernicious vnto theus, whereupon changing their mindes with their fortunes, beganne a vie, who should be first in shewing their alteration, by comming in to the Deputy.

(125) The Earle not ignorant how their affections declined, his owne forces shaken, and the fidelity of his followers more and more suspected, hee once more determined to prevent the worst, by his submission, which in humble letters he sent to the Queene, wherein with prayers and teares hee craved pardon of his faults: to such an ebbe was the swelling tides of his rebellious heart brought. Her Maistie (whose Nature was Mercy) euer diffusive of blood, gave the Lord Deputy authority to pardon his life, though hardly drawn to remit his offences, they being so many and great: His friends that assisted him, and Mac Bawn his brother, daily solicited the Deputy for his peace, which lastly, vpon an absolute promise, to put his life and renewers, without any condition, to the will of the Queene, was granted; and so Nel-lusant, accompanied with two persons and no more, had access into the Chamber of Presence, where the Lord Deputy sat in a Chaire of Estate, most of his Marshallists standing about him.

(126) Tiron, in bafe and poore array, with a dejected countenance, at the very entrance fell down vpon his knees, and so retired till hee was commanded to arise, and come neerer; when stepping forward a few paces, hee fell againe prostrate, and like a most humble Supplicane, in words well couched (as cunning hee was both in speech and action) acknowledged his finnes against God, and fault vnto her Maistie; and thus beganne his submission to the Lord General.

In the royall alms-house of my dread Soueraine and most gracious Queene, I doe awfully lay the blame and guilt of my new remaining estate, vnto whose pleasure I absolutely remit my life, and who's remembrance; and doe most submissively deplore mine owne misery, beseeching againe her mercy, whose beautifull favours I haue heretofore, and mighty powers now of late both felt and found, and well hope, that the fountains of her ever-flowing graces are not dryed dry. Let mee (I pray) bee the subject, whereas her mercy may worke, and an example for euer of her mild clemency, both to dimme her princely leuety, and to redreeme in some part the honor I haue lost. For age I am not so conseruable part of body so vnable, neither in courage so debilitated, but that my faithfull seruice in her behalf, may expiate, and make some measure of satisfaction, for these my many and most dysloyall rebellions. And yet I may easily complain, that through the malicious enuy of some, I haue bene hardly and vnfriendly dealt with, which may somewhat extenuate my crime and offence. But as he was enforcing this point further, the Lord Deputy interrupted his speech, and with a few words delivered with great authority, (which his Marshallist stands in stead of Elegance) told him, that there was no excuse to be heard, his crimes were too great; and thereupon commanded him to depart the Presence: which he did with a countenance seeming very heavy and sad. The next day departing for Dublin, heeooke Tiron his chier, meaning to transport him for England, had not the death of the Queene hindered his designe. These things premised, and Ireland thus recovered that was in hazard to be lost, let vs retorne to our English affayres, from whence these Tris bogges haue detained vs too long.

(127) On what termes the Earle of Essex left Ireland we haue already heard, and to what lamentable successe the height of his life brought him, is now to be related; wherein hee may be the example of fortunes diluance, and of the volatill felicity had in this life: a man indeede filled with the affection of his Prince & the people, & fraught with honourable habilites to purchase both, vntill by his owne vnadvisednesse (for so it must needs be censured) hee clouded his honour, wisdom, and loyalty, with the shadowes of his owne disconcor. Whether his Soueraignes fauours were the wings of warre, the pillars of his high hopes, I doe not confute; but that some secret vnder-workings gave fire to his passionate disconcor, I doubt not, hauing seene his owne letters penned in that behalf. Howeuer, sure sure it is, the Eie of Ielouſie now laſſly attended him, and his doings were more noted, they was made ſhew of: wherefore being yet in Ireland with an eminent authority, followed with the flower and chieft men of warre, and ſuſpected to be too well reſpected by the Arch-rebell ſir Don, it was held good policy (vpon another pretended occaſion) to muſter ſorce, and to make a Lord Lieutenant Generall of all England, which was, the right honorable Charles Howard Earle of Nottingham Lord high Admirall.

(328) The ſhew of this preparation was a pre-empting providence (as was pretended) againſt a Spaniſh Navy in new rigging for the Sea; and indeed ſuch preparation in that Summer was made, as the like had not beene in England ſince Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne. For London was allotted to furniſh fixteene Ships to the Seas, and fix thouſand ſouldiers for the Land ſervice, whereof three thouſand were to reſt crier in a readineſſe, and the other three thouſand (all of them houſeholders) to attend and guard her Maſteſſes royall Poyſell. And out of many Countries adioyning, ſuch numbers of brave horſe and horſemen were gathered, as never till then had beene ſene; the fame whereof was ſo ſtrengthened, as neither Spain, nor any other, could have any heart to make attempt this way.

(329) But the Earle of Essex arriving in England not onely peaceably, but alſo very privately and vnaccompanied (as hath beene ſaide) and now remaining in the Lord Keepers cuſtody, was often and ſeriously dealt with, by that truly honourable and prudent ſenſit (of whom hee was intirely affected) ſomewhat to decline his lofty ſwearing, left in mourning too high, he ſhould melt his waxen wings againſt the hot Sunne, and not to ſuffer the ſore to fester till it were paine cure; to which purpoſe alſo hee afterward wrote him a letter of pithy and ſharp perſuaſions, out of the abundance of his well-wiſhing heart; the copy whereof we hold worthy to bee here preſented.

The Lord Keeper to the Earle of Essex Iulie 18. An. 1598.

(330) My very good Lord. It is often ſene, that a flander by ſome man here hee that plays the game; and for the moſt part every man in his owne cauſe, flanders in his owne light, and ſeeth not ſo cleerly as hee ſhould. Your Lordſhippe hath dealt in other mens cauſes, and in greate and weighty affaires with great wiſdome and iudgement; now your owne is in hand, you are not to censure or reſuſe the aduiſe of any that loueth you, how ſimple ſeuere. In this order I range my ſelfe; of thoſe that loue you none more ſimple, and none that loueth you with more true and honeſt affection: which ſhall please mine excuſe, if you ſhall either miſtake, or miſconſider, my words or meaning. But in your Lordſhips honorable wiſdome I neither doubt nor ſuſpect the one or other. I will not preſume to aduiſe you, but I will ſhew my bold, and tell you what I thinke. The beginning and too-long extenuating of this vnconſolable diſcontent you have ſerued and prouoked, by which you may ſee at the end. If you hold ſtill this courſe (which hitherto you finde to bee worſe and worſe, and the longer you goe, the farther out of the way) there is little hope, or likelihood that the end will bee better. You are not yet ſo farre gone, but you may well returne; the returne is ſafe, the progreſſe dangerous and deſperate.

In this conſeyce you hold, if you have any enemies, you doe that for them which they could neuer doe for themſelues. Your friends you leaue open to ſcorne and contempt; you forſake your ſelfe, and overthrow your fortunes, and reuocate your honour and reputation. You giue that courage and comfort to the ſervile enemies, as greater they cannot haue. For what can bee more welcome, or more pleaſing newes vnto them, then to heare that her Maieſty and the Realme are mayned of ſo worthy a member, who hath ſo often and ſo valiantly quailed and danted them. You forſake your Country, when it hath moſt neede of your counſell or helpe. And laſtly, you faile in that indiſſoluble duty which you owe to your moſt gracious Soueraigne. A duty impoſed vpon you, not by nature or policy only, but by that religious and ſacred band, wherein the diuine Maieſty of almighty God hath by the rule of Chriſtianitie obliged you.

As for the ſoure fiſt, your conſtant reſolution may perhaps moue you to eſteeme them as light; but being well weighed they are not light, nor lightly to be regarded. And for the two laſt, it may ſeeme that the cleareneſſe of your inward conſcience, may ſeeme to content your ſelfe. But that is not enough; theſe duties ſtand not onely in contemplation, or in inward meditation: their effect is her externall action, and when that faileth, the ſubſtance faileth.

This being your preſent ſtate and condition, what is to be done? what is the remedy? My good Lord I lack wiſdome and iudgement to aduiſe you; but I will neuer lacke on howe true heart to wiſh well, nor (being warranted by a good conſcience) will ſcare to ſpeake what I thinke.

I haue begunne plainly, be not offended if I proceede ſo. Bene credat, qui credit temporis. Scence with well, Lex in nocentem punit, credendum eſt iuſtitiæ; ſi innocentem, credendum eſt fortune. The medicine and remedie is, not to censure and ſtrive, but humbly to yield and ſubmit. Haue you giuen a cauſe, and yet take a ſtandall vnto you? then all you can doe, is too little to make ſatisfaction. If cauſe of ſtandall giuen vnto you? yet policy, duty, and religion, enforce you to ſue, yeelde, and ſubmit, to your Soueraigne, betwixt whom and you there can bee no proportion of duty. When God requires it as a principall duty and ſervice to himſelfe; and when it is euident, that great good may enſue of it to your friends, your ſelfe, your Country, and your Soueraigne, and extreme harme by the contrary: there can bee no diſhonour or hurt to yeelde, but in not doing of it, is diſhonour and impiety.

The difficulty (my good Lord) is to conquer your ſelfe, whoſe is the height of true valour and fortitude; whereunto all your honorable actions have intended. Doe it in this, and God will be pleaſed, her Maieſty (I doubt not) will ſatisfie: your Country will take good, and your friends take comfort by it; and your ſelfe (I mention you laſt, for I know that of all theſe, you ſteward your ſelfe leaſt) ſhall receive honour, and your enemies (if you haue any) ſhall be diſappointed of their bitter-ſweet hopes.

I haue deliuered what I thinke, ſimply and truly; and leaue you to determine according to your wiſdome. If I haue erred, it is Error amoris, not, Amor erroris. Conſider and accept it (I beſeech you) as I mean it; not as an aduiſe, but as an opinion, to be allowed or cancelled at your pleaſure. If I might continually haue conferred with your ſelfe in perſon, I would not haue troubled you with ſo many idle blaſes. Whatſoeuer you iudge of this mine opinion, yet bee aſſured my deſire is to further all good meanes that may tend to your good, and ſo wiſhing you all honourable happineſſe, I reſt your Lordſhippes moſt ready and faithfull, though vnable, poore friends.

The Earles Anſwere.

(331) My very good Lord. Though there is not the man this day liuing, whom I would ſoner make a Iudge of any queſtion that did concerne mee, then your ſelfe: yet you muſt giue me leave to tell you, that in ſome caſes I muſt appeale from all earthly Iudges, and if in any, then ſurely in this, when the beſt Iudge on earth hath impoſed vpon mee the heauieſt puniſhment, without trial or hearing. Since then I muſt either anſwere your Lordſhips arguments, or forſake mine owne miſt defence, I will ſerue mine aking bid to doe more ſervice for an houre.

I muſt firſt deny my diſſeuagement, which was forced, to be an humours discontentment, and in that it was unreasonable, and a too long continuing, your Lordships should rather condole with me, then expostulate. Now all that is expected here below, but violent and unreasonable stormes come from above: there is no tempest to the passionate indignation of a Prince, nor that at any time so unreasonable, as when it lighteth on those that might expect an honour of their painfull and careful labours; id or that it were wounded, would feel smart till his hurt is cured, or the part sensible; but cure I expect none, her Maiesties heart being absolute; and be without sense I cannot. But then (you say) I may ayme at the end. I doe more then ayme, for I see an end of all my fortunes, and have set an end to all my desires. In this course doe I any thing for more enemies? when I was present, I found them absolute, and therefore I had rather they should triumph alone, then have more attendants upon their Obstinacy. Or doe I leave my friends? when I was a Courtier, I could yield them no fruit of my love to them; now I am an Heremite, they shall have no cause for their love to me. Or doe I forsake my selfe, because I doe enuy my selfe? Or doe I desert my fortunes, because I build not a fortune of paper wallee, which every puffe of wind blows downe? Or doe I reuaine more honour because I leave following the pursuit, or wearing the false marks of the shadow of honour? Doe I give courage or comfort to the farraine enemies, because I refuse my selfe to encounter them, or because I keepe mine heart from harmes, though I cannot keepe my fortune from declining? No, no, I give cause one of these considerations: but doe right, and the more I weigh them, the more I finde my selfe justified from offending on any of them. As for the two last objections, that I for sake my Country when it hath most need of me, and aide in that indissoluble duty which I owe to my Soueraigne: I answer, that my Country had at this time need of my publicke service, her Maiestie that governes it would not have discom me to a private life.

I am tied to my Country by two bands; one publique, to discharge carefully faithfully, and industriously that trust that is committed unto me, and the other private, so far as I can, for my life and ease, which have bene nourished in it. Of the first I am free, being dismissed or disabled by her Maiestie. Of the other, nothing can free me but death, and therefore no occasion of performance shall offer it selfe, but I will meet it halfly way. The indissoluble duty which I owe to her Maiestie, in the duties of allegiance which I will never, nor can I, in the duties of attendance in maidorable duty. I owe her Maiesties service of an Earle, and of a Marshall of England. I have bene committed to doe her the service of a Clerke, but can never serve her as a villaine, as a slave. But yet (you say) I must give my time to: so I doe for now I see the storme come, I have put my selfe into the harbour. Scarcely such, we must give way to fortune. I know that fortune is blind and flying, and therefore I goe as farre out of the way as I can. You say the remedy is not to be, I neither strive nor seek for remedy, but I must yield and submit: I can never yield my selfe to be gilty, or this impossible lately laid upon me, I am gilty: I owe much to the Author of truth, as I can never yield truth to be falsehood, or falsehood to be truth. Have I given cause (you aske) and take a scandal? No, I gave not cause to take up much as Flaminius his complaint, for I did not in telum corpore accipere. I patiently beare all, and sensibly feeble all that I then received. When the scandal was given me, may, when the worst of all indignities are done unto me, day Religion enforce me to refuse? But God require it? is it impiety not to do so? why? cannot Princes erre? cannot subiects receive wrong? is an earthly power or authority sufficient? Pardon me, pardon me my Lords, I can never subscribe to these principles: but Salomons sower laughter when he is stricken: Let these that mean to make their profit by Princes faults, shew to have no feare of Princes injuries. Let them acknowledge an infinite absolute in earth, that doe not believe in an absolute infinitum in heaven. As for me, I have received wrong, I feele it, my conscience good I know it. And whatsoever come all the powers on earth can never serve more strength and constancy in opposing, then I can serve in suffering, in whatsoever shall be imposed upon me.

Your Lordships in the beginning of your letter made your selfe a looker on, and were a player of mine true game; so you may see more then I: but you must give me leave to tell you in the end of mine, that since you have set and I suffer, I must of necessity feele more then you. I must crave your Lordships patience, to give him that hath a crabbed fortune leave to use a crabbed stile. But whatsoever my stile is, there is no heart more humble, nor more affected towards your Lordship, then that of your Lordships poore friend

R. ESSEX.

(332) The dis tempered humor discovering it selfe in this letter, argueth both the depth of his letted discontent, and the danger of giving way to violent passions, which not only deprive the wile of the view of their owne underhanding, but also blinde their eyes that they cannot see, nor apprehend the benefice of other mens faithfull counells. Notwithstanding, it pleased her gracions Highnesse (whom he so enueth as wronging him, for lending a more attentive care to his enemies suggestions, then to his owne satisfactions) first, not remitte his charge to his owne house, and then loth to looke into his faults but with her princely eye of fauour to proceed vnto some moderate censure of his actions, to the end he might see his owne errors, and ther by limit his power as her owne might be secured.

(333) To which end these assigned certain of her Privy Councell to conuene him concerning the breaking of his former instructions for the North Irish prosecution, and the manner of his treating with Tír-Ora, his coming from Ireland, and leaving that Kingdom contrary to her Maiesties expresse commandement, signed under the Royall Hand and Signet. Whereunto his answer was, that the State of Warre held it a Maxime, to make good the Stand before the Remour, and that it was one thing at Table to direct, but another thing in field to effect, especially in Ireland, whose war was with Ragged Woods, as well as with Men. And to the rest of the objections he answered with such obedient discretion, and loyal submission, as hee well satisfied the Honourable presence, only a suspension from the exercise of some of his Offices was decreed, untill her Maiesties pleasure should otherwise order it. Shortly after hee was set at full liberty; the Queene sending him word that shee well hoped his surety guard would now be his owne discretion.

(334) But seeing his wonted gratefull restrained, though the scope of his liberty was thus farre enlarged, hee presently mourned higher with the wings of discontent; for deprived of Offices, neglected in Court, and all his fortune services poured into her Maiesties lappe, was now (as he imagined) there wrapped up, and laid in obliuion. Neither were these his grievances lessened by his military followers, who daily waited their ill set plants with their exasperated complaints, all they were sprung to some height, and still to nourish their lappes, many prociets were cast, and conferences held how to lop off other branches, which as they feared would hinder their growth, till lastly at Drury house they agreed on the manner (O had it withered before it had blowed, or died in the grafting before it rooke lappes) which was by violent hand to bring the Earle into her Maiesties presence, and to remove from her such as they deemed his opposites.

(335) The frequent assembly vnto Essex house by Noblemen, Knights, Captaines, and others, was presently observed by the Statists in Court, so stoppe the current of which conference before it grew to a flood, Secretary Herbert was sent from her Maiestie to require him to repaire before the Lords of her Councell, then assembled at Salisbury Court, which hee excusing with sicknesse, neglected to do, and the time night upon some further reports for a double watch about him, pretending some danger to bee meant to his person. For whose defence the next morning (being Sunday) many repaired unto his house, among whom, as chiefe were the Earles of Northland and Southampton, the Lord Sunder and Montague, accompanied with a Troupe of gallant Gentlemen their followers.

(336) Her Majesty hearing of these disorderlie proceedings, in her princely wisdomethought to call water upon this beguine fire, before it brake forth into flame, and thereupon sent foure men of much honour unto his place, to offer him iustice for any grieues, and to command the assembly to depart. The persons sent were the L. Keeper of the great Seale, the Earle of Worcester, Sir Francis Knowles his vicie, and the Lord Chiefe Iustice of England, all of them in high honour and fauour with the Earle himselfe.

(337) These coming to his house without Temple-barre, were received in themselves, but scarce any of their seruants suffered to follow, excepting the Bearer of the Purse and Seale, where finding the Court full of these his followers, the Lord Keeper putting off his harte, tolde them that they were sent by her Majesty to understand the cause of this their assembly, and to let themselves, that if they had any particular cause of grieue against any person whatsoever, they should haue hearing, and iustice. The Earle of Essex answered that his life was sought after, and that hee had beene perfectly dealt withall. To which the Lord Chiefe Iustice replied, that if any such matter was attempted, it was time for him to declare it, assuring him of a faithfull relation, and that her Majesty would doe him iustice. Which promises the Lord Keeper seconded, and desired the Earle to declare his grieues, if not openly, yet in priuate, and he doubted not but to procure him full satisfaction, & then turning towards the multitude, with a louder voice saide; I do command you all vpon your allegiance not to lay downe your Weapons, and to depart. Whereupon the Earle himselfe went into his Booke-chamber, the foure Counsellors following him in hope of private conference; but so farr off was hee from hearing them further, or answering to their demands, that leauing them there vnder sure custody, hee returned to his other attendantes.

(338) With whom in tumultuous manner, hee made into London, his followers crying, that the Earle of Essex should haue beene murdered by Cobham, Cecil, and Rensley, all men amazed what this did meane. Thus past hee from Ludgate through Cheapside, into St. Dunstons Church, where hee entered the house of a supposed friend (then one of the Shirriffes) who seeing the multitude, auoided himselfe out at a backe-dore, when presently in diuers parts of the City Essex was proclaimed a Traitor, to the no lesse grieue of the Citizens, then feares of his followers, and thence returning with a Halbert in his hand, and a Table-napkin about his necke, came into Gracious street, where a while hee made his stand, (the Lord Mayor and others being assembled at the vpper end towards Leaden-hall) no one Citizen or seruant shewing him any signe of assistance. The case so desperate, one of the principall offenders contriued how by redeeming his fault, to save his owne life; who halting into the Strand to Essexs house, and coming to Sir Iohn Dares, as being sent from the Earle, gat release of the foure Counsellors, vnder whose guard they had beene hitherto kept.

(339) Essex now despairing of all succours in London, saw it was bootlesse there to make his shode, & therefore retired againe towards Paules, meaning to passe Ludgate the way that he came, but being resisted by a company of Pikemen, and other forces, made by that stout and noble Prelate, the then Lord Bishoppe of London, hee was put backe, Sir Christopher Blount forehurt, and young Tracy slaine; besides some others on the Queenes part, himselfe narrowly escaping, being thrust through the haute with a pyke. So hence againe returning, at Queene Hiue heeooke boote, bidding the City and his fortunes adue.

(340) His enterprise thus frustrate, with a mind distracted hee rowed vnder the river, and landed at the Water-gate of his owne house, which hee presently fortified; and the Lord Admirall assaulted, iustifying notwithstanding the Countesse of Essex, the Lady Roch and three Gentlewomen to depart, which done, hee forced the Garden cuen to the wallee of the house. Some resistance was made, and some persons slaine vpon either part, which the Earle perceiving, presently yielded, desiring onely that hee might bee ciuilly vided, and that hee might haue an honourable trull, and so being first brought to Lambeth-house, where an he wrote or two hee remained with the Lord Archbishoppe (his cuer most louing, but then most mournfull friend) was thence with some other Lords and Gentlemen conuayed by water to the Tower, about tenne of the clocke the same night: hauing then experience, that vaine is the issue of the Countesse to a subiect? (how great former) when it is counterbalanced with the dutifull obedience vnto their Prince.

(341) Vpon the nineteenth of the same moneth, the Earle of Essex and Southampton were arraigned at Westminster, the Lord Buckhurst Lord high Treasurer of England being made Lord Steward for the day, where the great resolution of the one, concerning death, and the sweet temper of the other well deserveng life, did breed most compassionate affections in all men, hearing the force of law to passe vpon them. The one of them remained prisoner in the Tower during the reigne of the Queene, and by the gracious clemency of our Soueraigne Lord King James at his comming to the Crowne, had pardon of life, and restoration of blood, the other (Essex) the five and twentieth of February being Wednesday, suffered vpon the Greene within the Tower, rendering his soule to God with a most penitent and Christian constancie, whole last speeches were to this effect.

(342) "My Lords and Christian brethren, who are present witnesses of my iust punishment, I confesse (to Gods glory) my selfe a most wretched sinner, and that my finnes in number exceed the haire of my head; that good which I would haue done, that did I not, and the eail which I would not, that did I. For all which I beseech my Saviour Christ to bee a Mediator to my Father my God, especially for this my last siane, this great, this crying, this bloody, this infectious siane, wherein through loue of mee, so many haue beene drawn to offend God, theie Soueraigne, and the world. I beseech God, her Majesty, and the State, to forgive vs; and I beseech him to blesse her with a prosperous reigne, with a wife and vnderstanding heare, to blesse the Nobles and Ministers of the Church and State. I likewise beseech you, and all the world, to hold a charitable opinion of mee, for my intention towards her Majesty, whole death (I protest) I neuer meant, nor any violence towards her Person. I thank God, I neuer was Atheist, in not beleeking the Scriptures: neither Papist, trusting in my owne merits; but am assured to be assured by the mercies and merits of Christ Iesus my Saviour. This faith I was brought vp in, and herein I am now ready to dye; beseeching you alio ioyne your sooles with mee in praier, that my soule may bee lifted vp by faith, above all earthly things; and first I desire forgiveness of all the world, even as freely, as from my heart I forgive all the world.

(343) And then kneeling downe saide, I haue beene diuers times in places of danger, where death was neither so present nor so certaine, and yet euen then I felt the weaknesse of my flesh, and therefore now in this last and great combat, I desire Gods assistance

The griefe commoned for the death of Essex
his death

(145) As the death of this Noble-man was much lamented by the subjects, (whose loue towards him was so ingrafted, as I thinke, I may well say, neuer fubied had more,) so her Maieity likewise, hauing such a Starre fallen from her firmament, was lowly moued, and outwardly oftentimes would shew passions of her griefe, euen till the time of her approaching end, when two yeeres after shee laide downe her Head in the Graue, as the most splend-dent Sonne set forth at last in Western cloud.

A briefe Graue
of Queen Elizabeth the prince

(146) The fate of which Great Queene throughout the whole course of her most flourishing reigne, was (as in part you haue scene shadowed already) so beautified and strengthened with all honourable per-fections, both of Peace, and Warre, as neuer any Monarch reigned with greater obseruance of her owne, nor ruled with more obsequious magnanimity toward foraine Nations: inasmuch, as if her incomparable vertues and praises were truly and exactly described (a worke worthy some noble spirit and penne) weare verily perswaded, that future ages will somewhether flatter and doo be, whether such celebration of her, were not rather affectionately Poeticall, then faithfully Historiicall.

Her fury and affection in foreign Counsels.

(147) For, the great affaires of Europe mainly depended vpon her directions, who sitting at the Helme of the Shippe (as Francis spake of Antonius the Emperour) it directed and guided their Estates both in peace and warre: Spain, seeking to outflowe all, was beaten backe, and scarcely able to maintaine her owne bulwarks: In France, the house of Val-lois vnder-propped by her counsell; that of Bur-bon, aduanced by her countenance, forces, and treasure; Scotland releued by her loue; Netherlands by her power: Portugall King by her bounty; Poland by her commiseration; likewise Germany, Denmark, Sweden, often tooke vp and laide downe Armes at her becke and dispose. Neither could the utmost bounde of Europe, (the English and Tartari) contain the limits and extent of her great fame; but that the same pierced further into the remotest parts of Asia, Africa, America, among the Turkes, (whose great Emperour, in honour of so great a Mediterranean, granted peace vnto the Palatines outwarne with warre,) among the Persians, Barkutians, Indians, and where not? In most of whose Dominions to the great enriching of her Kingdome, shee settled commerce for increase of merchandize, and gok large priuiledges for encouragement of her Merchants, whom shee cherished as a most necessary and important part of her Weale Publicke.

Her Princely qualities.

(148) Who, for her royall actions and Princely qualities of Minde (seated also in such a Body as for state, stature, beauty, and Maieity, best befitted an Emperesse,) may be singled out for an Idea of an absolute Prince, her Sex onely excepted, which yet made her vertues more remarkable, as being (and so reputed by Strangers) of all the Princesses of her time, the most exact obseruer (both for Admiration and Ceremony) of true Regall deportment and magnificence. For her enterprises as fortunate as Caesar, for life, loue, wisdom, and magnanimity, another Augustus; by her pectable reigne flouting the Temple of Warre in England (whiles all Nations round about her felt the malices of warre) as hee did the doores of Ianus in Rome. And yet had shee Warriors like vnto the Worthies of Damascus; her for-raine employment, Nauegations, and Discoveries, hauing bred such numbers of most renowned Captaines, both for Sea and Land, as none of our former Princesses hath scene the like. With which necessary kinde of noble Seruants, that her owne Kingdome might be alwaies manied (as foretelling the vncertainties and sudden changes in the Peace-preserving amities of foraine Princes,) shee extempered many of her Genry and others, in the warpes of Princes abroad, so to perfect them for all occurrences of their Country at home; which also induced her (some Strangers haue thought) to suffer that long lingering protraction of her High warres, the rather, to keepe in vire and exercise, the skill and valour of her English. By which means, the spreading fame and extent of her Empire was such, that shee might seeme a second Traian, who laide the circuite of the Romanes the largest; hauing not onely so powerfull a Navy still in readinesse, as wherby shee attained the Souerainety of the Sea, but so famous Sea-men also, as that, vnder her auspicious Raigne, twice was the whole Globe of the Terrestrial World filled round about.

(149) Neetherlesse was her renowne for those other vertues which are the attendants of Peace; her Clemency, Justice, and Temperance: touching the last of which, as in one kind (of her diet and pri-uate life,) King Edward her brother vically called her, his Lady Temper: so of another kinde of temperance in this learnedest of Queenes, (the hardnesse of King) hath giuen this memorable testimony, that when as France (part of her Royall Title) was in civil warres, Spain (her mortall Enemy) enfeebled both in power and port; Netherland ambitions of her government, and Scotland ruled by an Infant, yet in such abundance both of meanes, opportunities, and prouocations, so superabundant was her moderation and temper, that shee euer religiously abstained from all ambitious desire of enuicement, on the rights or territories of any her neighbour Princes. Being in this, and those other her virtuous actions, such, as of whom that which was spoken of Antonius Pius may more truly be verified, that scarcely, in youth shee did any thing rashly, or in her age indifferently; scarcely, I say: for as a Creature, we cannot exempt her from all frailties, as a Woman, from passions, or as a Prince, from all errors, whereunto, euen against her owne naturall inclination, shee might be drawn, either on misinformation, or on opinion of necessity in the State. For her Court, it was not onely a frequent Academie, of Honourable Counsellors, illustrious Peeres, Gallant Courtiers, Learned Professors, Intelligent Statists, as euer attended any Christian Prince, but also a Nursery, where young Nobles and others might be trained vp to the managing of greater affaires, and a Sanctuary where the meanest might finde reliefe against the mightiest; because in the Wisdome in her Counsell were content to learne wisdom from her directions, so the Greatest were drawn to practise Equity, both by her example and command. Yea, which is more admirable in her Sex, so reuerend was shee from giuing any man too-much interrest, or being led and overruled by any of her Great-ones about her, that they all stood in a reuerence of her very preface and aspect; but much more of her

CHAPTER I.

A.D. 1602.

Before the conceived sorrowes, for the death of the late renowned Queen could fully be dissolued into teares, or those get passage from the heart to the eyes, the conduit was stopp'd with a sodaine ioy, and all faces cleared, before that sad penitencie had therein got her full print. The state of England hiding that day, like vnto that of Israhel, wherein the foundation of the second Temple was laid, whole ancient men mourned, as doubting the glory thereof could not be answerable to that of Salomons; but as they were comforted by a Prophet from God, THAT THE GLORIE OF THE LATER SHOVLDE SVRMOVNT THE FORMER, so all English hearts by a diuine blessing from God were presently cheered, when they saw their mourning stare rise in the North, whole

Christ would not be Judge of the substance between brethren but Vice will a good all right.

Pole with his attractive power, long before had drawn in the Needle of the Southern Compass unto that One point.

(2) Immediately upon the death of the Queen, the Lords of the Land gave full satisfaction unto the people, in proclaiming JAMES THE SIXTH, KING OF SCOTLAND, by the name of JAMES THE FIRST KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH &c. to the unspeakable comfort of all true English, as well for his unquestionable claims, as for that hee professed the same true Religion (whose preservation was their tender care) as also for his singular learning and experience, whereby hee was accomplished to undergoe the managing of so great an Empire, having now attained to thirty five yeeres, nine months and five dayes, exercised altogether in the practise of Kingly government, from the very first dayes of his infancy.

(3) That his Title was most iust, no man can deny, being sprung from the vniuersed Roses of Lancaster and York, King Henry the seventh, and Queen Elizabeth his wife: whose issue by the Male failing in the late deceased Queen Elizabeth of glorious memory, the offspring of Mary her eldest daughter, was the next heire, which Lady married vnto James the fourth King of Scotland; by him had issue King James the fifth, whose only Daughter Queen Mary was Mother of this our mighty Monarch. Let Doleman therefore do vpon his own dreames, and other like Traitors fashion their barres vpon the Popes forge, yet hath God &c. his right set him on the throne of his most lawfull inheritance, so to vniue the two Crowns into one: Gods omnipotent arme bringing at last that to passe, which had often bene assayed, but could not bee effected by any power of man. For, did not Edward our first, the terror of Syria, and Edward the first our godly iustars, both of them distresse Scotland with their warres, only to haue made an vnion by the marriages of the next heire, and of their Queene? But the time being not come, and all other preceding Princes failing of their purposes, the peacable vnion of those two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, as also of two other, France and Ireland was reserved for Him, who is a pattern of all princely Learning and Piety, vnto all other Monarches vpon the face of the Earth.

(4) But these calme proceedings without any opposition, as they were most ioyfull to the English, so were they admirable vnto other forraigne Nations, yea, and enuied at of some, especially, such as hoped for an alteration, or at leastwise a toleration of Religion. And so much the rather, for that Pope Clement the eight, had sent the yeere before vnto Henry Carver, Superior of the Iesuites in England, the Buller to the contrary, one to the Clergy, and the other to the Laity. The title of the former was, Dilectis filijs Archiepiscopis, & reliquis Clero Anglicano, &c. the latter, Dilectis filijs, Principibus, & Nobilibus, Catholicis Anglicanis, Saluati & Apostolicam Benedictionem: the summe of both thus. To you beloued sonnes, the Archbishops and the Clergy, the Princes and Nobles, Catholics of England, greeting, and Apostolicall Benediction &c. The tenor was, that after the death of her Maieity, whether by course of Nature, or otherwise: If hereafter should lay claim to this the Crown of England, though neuer so directly, and merely interestedly dissent, should not be admitted vnto the throne, vntill he would first tolerate the Romish Religion, and by all his best conuincement: promise the Catholic cause, vnto which, by a solemn and sacred Oath, hee should religiously subscribe, after the death of that Miserable woman, for so it pleased his Holinesse to terme Elizabeth, that most great and happy Queen. By vertue of which Bulls, (if vertue may be in any such vicious Libels) the Iesuites dissuaded the Romish minded Subjects from yielding (in any wise) obedience vnto King James, as being not an obedient Catholic King, but this not working to their wished effect, and He now solemnly proclaimed with an vniuersall applause, lone and peace, their hopes beganne to grow cold, and so fauours from Spain being now to bee expected, Garnet the Superior to anoid further dangers, sacrificed these hunger-starued Bulls to Fallen the fiery God.

(5) King James in Scotland receiving intelligence of the most plausible passages to this enlargement of his Seile and Dominions, prepared himselfe hitherward, and vpon the sixt of Aprill came to Barnwick, thence to Wetherington, Newcastle, Durham, York, Danvers, Newcastle, Burleigh, Leith, Whitehall, and thence to London vpon the seventh of May. In all which places hee was most royally and ioyfully receiued, with all demonstrations of true loyalty, loue and obedience, which was no lesse benignely accepted of by his Maieity, who the better to manifest his royall disposition, in all such places as hee came, where Gaioles for offenders were kept, on of his clemency most graciously first the Prisoners, (those only excepted, who lay for treason, murder, or Romish disloyalty) discharging also large summes of money for release of many others from their creditors.

(6) In all which progresse, admirable was the confluence of people, which with haste to meete him, seemed rather to flee then to runne, and such were their shoutes of ioy, that the liues resounded the Echo thereof, even vnto the heauens, which had bene so propitious, as to bestow on them Gods a King, which most abundantly appeared the day that his Maieity removed from Whitehall to London, when at Stamford-hill, near vnto Tottenham-Craspin Middlesex, the City of London (represented in the Lord Mayor, the Aldermen, with five hundred choice Citizens, all in chaines of gold, & very well mounted) met his Maieity, and with all solemn obsequence attended him vnto the Charter-house near Smithfield, which was most sumptuously furnished for his royall entertainment. On which very day, a Proclamation came forth against all griping Monopolies that hindered commerce, and Restrictions that stopped the due proceedings of law, as also against other abuses in other inferior carriages. All which were so acceptable to the People and Common-wealth (which had bene too much eaten out with such Locusts & Caterpillars) as neuer any King wanne himselfe more loue: these being accepted as the auspicious beginnings, promising most happy sequel. So that his entrance was as another Constantine, whose person every man prayed for, and desired to see: and for Peace another Ottavian, hauing ruled peaceably a stout stirring Nation, euen from his younger yeeres, and liued in peace with all the Princes and Kings of the earth: in which peace now lastly hee brought the Crown and Kingdomes of Scotland to augment the glory, circuit and strength of this Realme of England, in whose vnited body, as a faire branched tree, euen at the first hee beganne to engraft the Syences of his princely vertues, which by the lippe and Sannet-shine of his iust government still spreade more and more, like vnto the Cedars that grow vpon Lebanon.

(7) The English Empire thus peaceably established, both by, and vnto, this pectable Monarch: from sundry forraigne Princes were sent Ambassadors, to congratulate his entrance; as namely, from the Palm-grace of the Rhine, one of the Princes Electors for the Emperour of the Romans: from the French King, Memphis de Rais, Great Treasurer of France: from the Spanish King, Don Iohn de Tassis: from the States of Holland and Zealand: from the Archduke of Austria: from the Signory of Venice: from the Duke of Florence, and from others.

(8) But among all new-comers, none was more admired nor gazed on, then was Flagh O'Connell, Earle of Tir-new, that perfidious, (but very valiant) fable subtle, and smooth-tongued Traitor, and Bowles of Ireland, that had been the death of many a worthy man; who having (as we have shewed) yielded himselfe to the Lord General Munro in the sicknesse of the late Queen, was now by him brought unto England Court, to the Generall great honour, and Tir-na great good, if hee could have had grace to confine himselfe. For not onely was he taken vpon his lowly submission into favour with his dread Sovereigne, and restored to his former estate and dignity, (a very great favour to so great an offender) but a Proclamation was also made in his behaife, and for his security, that hee should of all men bee honourably vied (a grace, seldom shewed a Traitor) because as it seemed, his guilty conscience lancharged with blood, feared the hand of every man that beheld his face; and indeed many a woman, enraged for losse of their husbands or loones, furiously desired and assayed to quench their hatred with his blood: in which perplexity wee will leave him for a restless Rebel, who lastly like a fugitive left againe both his loyalty and his owne Country.

(9) In the meane while the solemnities for the Coronation were prepared, and many stately Trophies (no lesse due to the consecration of Peace, then to the achievings of Warre) in London direct for up, which by reason of the great sicknesse in that City then cruelly raging, stood a long time rather like the ruines of some old decay, then the Princely Pageants of a new Triumph. For before the appointed day of Coronation (which was the twenty fifth of July being the feast day of Saint James the Apostle) a Proclamation came forth, that no Londoner should presume to approach to the Court, the City having buried that weeke about a thousand of the plague. But yet a greater plague to the Land then this, was intended some weeke before, had not the providence of a good God prevented the designs of mercilesse men. For, certaine Italian Priests, boyling in revengefull rancor, because their plots and hopes (which they vainly promitted themselves for advancement of their Religion) were now past all appearance of possibility or success, and combining with some other of better Rank and Note, whom private discords had whetted on to a publick mischief; conspired together a desperate designe, for surprize of the Kings Person and Prince Henry his sonne. Of forces to effect it, they made no doubt, meaning to detain their prisoners in the Tower, and with the Treasures therein to maintain their incurre, or, if the Tower were impugnable, then to carry them to Dover Cattle, and there by violence either to obtaine their owne pardons, atteration in Religion, and a removal of some Confessors of the Seate, or else to put some further project in execution. To conceal this Treason, Walsen the Priest devised Oaths for secrecy, and himselfe with Clarke (another Priest also) taught, that the act was lawfull, being done before the Coronation, for that the King was no King, before he was anointed, and the Crowne solemnly set on his head.

(10) The other persons whose loyalty was likewise called into question, as involved in the attempt, were Henry Brooke, Lord Cobham and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Thomas Lord Gray of Wilton, Sir Walter Raleigh Lord Warden of the Stanneries, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sir Edward Parkin knights, George Brooke, and Bartholomew Brookes Esquires, and Anthony Capley a Gentleman; all which parties being apprehended, were committed some to the Gatchhouse at Windsor, others to the Tower of London. Meane while (notwithstanding the raging sicknesse) the day for the Coronation (being the feast of Saint James) was celebriously kept, with all solemne performance and ancient Rites of the English Kings, in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter in Windsor. Where, the antique Regall Chaire of inchronization, did blessedly receive, with the person of his Majesty, the full accomplishment also of that Propheticall prediction of this Isa coming to the Crowne, which Antiquity hath recorded to have beene therein inscribed thus.

Nil salus Fatum scilicet hunc quoniam Locutus Invenimus Lapidem, regnum tenemus sedem.

If Fates be right, this Stone, where d're 'tis plight, The Seat shall find, and there his Swaye alight.

For even there now the sacred Oile was poured vpon the toyall Persons of King James and Queen Anne, by the most reverend Prelate, John Wretts Lord Arch-Bishoppe of Canterbury, the Princesse and Peeres wearing their Robes and Coronets, the Officers giving attendance in their places, and the Lord Mayor of London in a Gowne of Crimson Velvet, with the Aldermen in Scarlet: twelve principall Citizens were admitted to attend them, all other forbidden because of the plague.

(11) As the great solitude of the City of London by reason of this infection, and the retirednesse both of his Majesty and all his Nobles, gave some hopes to the fore-mentioned Priests and their Associates, for the easier accomplishing their plots: it was also some occasion of the delay of Justice on them after their treasonous designs were now fully brought to light. Wherefore, London continuing still vntil for such a trill, and requisite concourse of Peeres and people, Windsor, the Temple being there kept, was the place designed for their arraignment, whether they were all conveyed vnder strong guard. The first who there came to their trial, were George Brooke, brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sir Edward Parkin, Brooksbey, Capley, Walsen, and Clarke; whose indictment was, that they had conspired; first, to destroy the King, secondly, to raise Rebellion; thirdly, to alter Religion; fourthly, to subvert the State; and lastly, to procure forreine Invasion. That theire their intents they had made knowne vnto the Lord Gray, whom they meant should have bene Earle Marshall of England, Walsen Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treasurer, and Sir Griffin Markham Secretary. That with the King, the Lords also should be surprized in their chambers at Greenwich, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London should bee kept for, and so be shut vp in the Tower.

(12) George Brooke hereunto answered (with a colour and pretext to leade as the attempt,) that he had Commission from the King to doe what hee did, onely to try faithfull Subjects; which commission hee could not produce. Sir Griffin Markham (excepting onely the imputation of blood) confessed his offence very penitently, alledging it was through a discontented mind, and desired the Lords to be a meane to the King for mercy. Walsen and Clarke (the former of which confessed he had drawn all those Gentlemen into these plots) did vainly and ignorantly asseure, that they held the King no King, until hee was Crowned, and that therefore it could not be Treason: alledging, that Saul was not King until he was chosen in Asisaph, though he had bene anointed in Rams by Sammel the Prophet; neither Ieroboam, who in the daies of Solomon, had bene confirmed by the Prophet to reigne over Israel, until the people made him King vpon the foolish answers of Behisam. Thus these great Rabbies made no difference betwixt the mediate and ordinary succession of lawfull Princes, ordered by God to be his Vice-gerents in fully established Commonweales, and those Kings which himselfe extraordinary advanced, and erected to be the whips in his hand; as the first manifestly proved, when they had cast off Sammel, and the latter allocated to no other end, as by the Prophet is apparent, where God saith, I gave them a King in mine anger, and I took condemned.

(13) Two daies after was Sir Walter Raleigh brought to the Barre, being indicted for combining with the Lord Cobham (his accuser) in the foresaid designs. Whereunto he pleaded not guilty, and so stood for his pargation, as he held argument from morning till night, to the hearers no little admiration, that a man of so exquisite understanding and experience should give consent vnto such a plot, no lesse foule, then foolish. Yet in fine hee was found guilty, and had sentence of death.

The Lords Cobham and Gray

condemned.

(14) The like iudgement, a few daies after, passed vpon the Lords, Cobham and Gray, arraigned on two several daies. The former being indicted for combining with Sir Walter Raleigh and George Brooke, to procure forces from the King of Spaine; and the Arch-Duke, for an Insurrection, &c. The other for ioyning with the foresaid Priests, Knights, and Gentlemen, in their fore-mentioned conspiracies. The Lord Chancellor of England, being Lord Steward for that service, sat vnder a Cloth of Estate in the upper end of the Hall, the Nobles sitting (as their Peeres and Judges) on benches vpon both sides. Those at the Barre he willed to bee bold, and to answer without feare: the Kings learned Council he intreated not to confound the memory of the prisoners with vaneccellary matters; and the Peeres, though vnrwise, hee aduised to try indifferently betwixt the King and the arraigned; who both pleading not guilty, were yet found otherwise by the Court, and received iudgement of death.

(15) Of all these arraigned, Sir Edward Perham only was acquitted by the Iury, and of all the rest only three died, which were Raleigh, Clarke, and Master George Brooke: the former of which, having at large laied open in Print, the Treasons and vnuisable machinations of the Iesuiticall Order, left this suspicion on them at his death, that they, in reuenge, had cunningly and courtly drawn him into this Action, which brought him to this shameful end. After whose death, his Maiesty then at Wiltm, (having commanded his Lords, to deliuer the true narration vnto him of the whole proceeding in the arraignments and answers of all the rest) signed also a warrant for the execution of the Lords Cobham and Gray, as also Markham, to be performed the Friday following betwixt ten of the clock in the morning. Notwithstanding his Maiesty more moued to milde mercy, then the high straine of Iustice, of his Princely and free clemencie, gave life vnto those persons, expecting present death, and thus with his owne hand wrote to counterchecke his former Warrant.

The Kings Letters with the stay of the Execution.

(16) Although it be true, that all well governed and flourishing Kingdomes and Common wealthes are established by Iustice, and that these two Noblemen by birth, that are now upon the point of execution, are far their reasonable profits condemned by the Law, and aduantage worthy of the execution thereof, to the example and terror of others: The one of them having seditiously practised the enuie of the whole Kingdom, and the other for the surprize of our owne Personne: yet to require that this is the first yere of our Reigne in this Kingdom, and that neuer King was so farre obliged to his People as we haue bene to this, by our entry hertvith so hearty and generall an applause of all sortes. Among whom all the kinne, friends, and allies of the saids condemned persons, write as far as it and dutyfull as any other our good Subiects, as also that as the very tone of their Arraignement none did more freely and readily give their assent to their conviction, and to deliuer them into the hands of Iustice, then so many of their moste Kindred and Allies (as being Peeres) were upon their Iury, as vnuisable in regard that Iustice hath bin some sort gotten course already, by the execution of the two Priests, and George Brooke, that vnto the principal plotters and intaisers of all the rest, to the enuie of the saids treasonable Machinations, one therefore being refused to mixe Clemency with Iustice) are condemned, and by these Presents command you, our present Sheriffe of Hamptonshire to superseed the Execution of the saids two Noblemen, and to take them backe to their prison againe, vntill we further pleasure bee knowne. And since we will not haue our Lawes to haue respect to persons in sparing the great, and striking the meane part, but our pleasure, that the like course be also taken with Markham, being sorry from our heart, that such is, not onely the beginning nature of the saids condemned persons crime, but also the corruption in so great of their natural disposition, as the care we haue for the safety and quiet of our State, and good Subiects, will not permit vs to use that Clemency towards them, which in our owne natural inclination, we might very easily be persuaded vnto.

(17) This Letter then framed, the deliury thereof his Maiesty committed vnto one John Gibb a Secretary Gentleman, a discreet person, and free from dependancy of any Noble man or Counsellor, neither was he of any extraordinary ranke, as well that the by-standers should not obtrude any alteration for the execution, as the delinquents themselves take any apprehension by his presence, to the end that each of them severally should prepare to breath out their last breath, with a true confession of their secret consciences. The time approaching, Sir Griffin Markham brought to the Scaffold, (to that end erected on the Castle Greene) made himselfe ready for the stroke of the Axe, when secretly Master Gibb deliuered vnto the high Sheriffe of the Shire the Kings Warrant to the contrary, who soone perceiving his Maiesties intent tooke backe the prisoner, (as if he were first to confront the two Lords in the Hall vpon some seruice to the King,) from the Scaffold, and brought him into the Castle Hall. Then was the Lord Gray brought forth, who having poured out his praies vnto God, at length kneeling downe for the stroke of death, the Sheriffe said stay, telling the Lord that some further service was expected of him, and thereupon likewise lead him againe into the Caille. The Lord Cobham then was brought to the Scaffold, who being in praies and preparation for death, the Lord Gray and Sir Griffin were brought backe againe, where the prisoners all three appearing together on the Scaffold, the Sheriffe notified his Maiesties Warrant for the stay of their Executions, and that as then they should not dye. Vpon which rare Clemency, vnepected both of prisoners and spectators, arose such thousens of the people, as was wonderfull, crying God save the King, and the condemned ouercome with his Clemency, wished they might sacrifice their liues to redeme their owne faults and to repurchase so mercifull a Princes loue.

A Proclamation for a conference to be held at Hampton Court on Thursday January 11.

The persons then present.

Christ Church, Wexford, Westminster, Pauls, Chester, and Windsor, with Doctor Field, & Doctor Knefel, the now Lord Bishoppe of London. To deliver the Plaintiffs desires, were summoned, and appeared Doctor Reynolds and Doctor Sparkes of Oxford, Mr. Kennel, and Mr. Chadsden of Cambridge.

(19) The first sitting was upon Saturday, the fourteenth of January, in his Majesties Privy-chamber at Hampton-Court, whereto the Church-Governours only being admitted (by his Majesties command) in the presence of his Privy Council, he made a most godly and princely declaration of his intent, in summoning this Assembly, in effect, thus, That this his proceeding was no noveltie, but according to the example of all Christian Princes, who in the commencement of their reigns, usually take the first course for the establishing of the Church both for doctrine and policy, to which the very Heathen themselves had relation in this their Procuress 2^d Iane Principum. And particularly in this land, King Henry the eight, towards the end of his reign; after him King Edward the sixt, who altered more; after him Queen Mary, who renewed all; and the last Queen of famous memory, who revived the Church here as now it standeth. Wherin yet his Majesty deemed himselfe happier then they, in that they were faine to alter those things which they found established, whereas himselfe saw yet no cause, so much to change any thing, as to confirme that which he found so well settled already. Which State so affected his Royall heart, that it pleased him, both to enter into a gratulation to almighty God, at which words he put off his hat; for bringing him into the land of Promise, where Religion was purely professed, where he sat amongst grave, learned, and reverend Divines, who better knew what belonged to the State of a King, to the honor and order of a kingdom, then some other Nations did, and withall to assure the Prelaty there present, that he intended not any Innovation, acknowledging the Government Ecclesiasticall to have bene approved by manifold blessings from God himselfe, both for the encrease of the Gospell, and with a most happy and glorious peace. Yet, because nothing could be so absolutely ordered, both that somewhat might be added, and in any State as in the body of man, Corruptions like ill humors might insensibly grow either through time or persons; his purpose was, after the example of a good Physitian, to make search into the supposed diseases, and to examine the complaints, so to remove the occasions thereof, if they prove scandalous, or to cure them, if they were dangerous, or if but frivolous, yet to take knowledge of them, thereby at once both to cast a stoppe into the mouth of Curious, and of all factious spirits, and withall to give satisfaction to all quiet and sober minded men.

(20) His Majesty concluding this his general advertisement, entered more particular discourse with the Bishops (for his owne private information) concerning the Booke of Common Prayer, Excommunication in the Ecclesiasticall Courts, and the promotion of fit and able Ministers for Ireland. Touching matters in the said Booke, he desired satisfaction; First, for Confirmation, which if it were held and so called, as in the Sacrament of Baptisme were thereby confirmed, & were Invalid without it, then was it in his judgement blasphemous: but if it were only that Children, who at their Baptisme made profession of their faith by the mouthes of others, might before the Bishops profess it in their owne persons, and so receive Episcopall Benediction by prayer, and imposition of hands, then was it of very sacred use in Gods Church. Secondly, for Abolution, which his Majesty had heard compared to the Popes pardons. Thirdly, for Private Baptisme, which he utterly disliked to be administered, but by a lawfull Minister. His second point was Excommunication, wherein he moved two especiall considerations, the one of the Matter, that the sentence being so weighty, was not to be pronounced upon every slight cause; the other of the Person, why Lay-men as Chancellors & Commisaries, and not rather the Deane and Chapter, or other grave Ministers and Chaplaines should be allowed by the Bishops for their assistants therein. The last which was touching a sufficient Minister in Ireland, his Majesty referred to another day.

(21) But his Majesty received full satisfaction & contentment by the severall answers to all his demands. Touching Confirmation, that the Church of England held it no essentiall part of the Sacrament of Baptisme, but a practise of the Primitive Church, yea of the Apostles; as Calais himselfe expounds their meaning, who also willed the retention thereof in such Churches where it had bene abolished, and for imposition of hands on children, warranted by Christ himselfe, a Custom still retained in our Church, as very godly and necessary for those very reasons and vice, which his Majesty had mentioned, and truly observed. Touching Abolution, it was answered, that as Christ desired not the death of sinners, so he hath given power and commandment to his Ministers, to pronounce his mercy with remission of finnes unto all Penitents, that the practise thereof in the English Church, is so farre from Popery, as that the Reformed Churches of Angola, Helme, and Saxony, do both allow it, and retain it, yea, and Calais himselfe approves it. Of Private Baptisme it was answered, that though the words seemed somewhat doubtfull, yet the practise of the English Church did contradict all administration of it by Laikes and Women, in conferring them in that case: whereupon it was concluded, that a lawfull Minister only should be employed in times of necessity, when the Infant was in danger of death yet so understood, that the person was in no wise to be reputed of the Essence of the Sacrament. And finally, for Excommunication, it was there resolved, that the abuses (if any such there were) being removed and amended, that sacred censure should retain its necessary vigour in the Church; and so for that day his Majesty dismissed the Assembly of his Prelates.

(22) Upon Monday following, being the sixteenth of January, those other Doctors, who were to relate the dislikes of the Opposites, were called likewise into the Privy Chamber, where in presence of his Prelates and Peeres his Majesty delivered unto them, a pithy & princely declaration of his mind, That he intended not to innovate the government now established, which by long experience hee had found accomplished with so singular blessings of God forty five yeeres, as that no Church upon the face of the earth had more flourished then this of England. But rather his meaning, and earnest desire was, first to settle uniformity through the whole, for the more quiet and flourishing estate thereof; secondly, to plant unity for the suppression of Papists, and enemies of Religion; thirdly to amend abuses as incident to Bishops politike; as in the shadow to the body Natural; which once getting entrance, hold on as a Wheele doth his motion, when it is once set on going. Among the complaints therefore of many grievances made since his entrance into England, none was more weighty, not himselfe more willing to heare and amend, then such as might concerne the State of the Church, if the same did in any wise decline from the ancient and Apollitical rule. For which cause he had sent for them, whom hee understood to be grave, learned, & modest Divines, to heare by them those grievances, and severall objections at large, and desired them boldly to declare the same.

(23) Whereupon Doctor Reynolds, a very learned man, after a preamble gratulatory (upon his knees) with acknowledgement of Gods mercy in giving vs to godly, so learned, so careful a King, reduced all matters, either desired or disliked amongst the weaker Brethren (whose Spiousness hee professed hee would not have beene, but only upon his Majesties mandatory Summons) vnto those foure heades. 1. for preservation of true doctrine. 2. for placing of good Pastors, 3. for sincere administration of the church government; 4. for explanation of some clauks in the Common-prayer Booke. It would be here too impertinent, to force an historical Narration vpon those Theological particulars, which vpon those foureall points were then produced, and are elicewhere to be found exactly related. Yet as wee cannot but commend the iudgement of these foure Diuines (as touching the third point) in that, finding no iust exception to the Episcopall Hierarchy of our Church, in no one word they impugned or disapproved the same; so much more must we celebrate the admirable dexterity, iudgement and learning of his sacred Majesty, ioynd with so rare Industry and patience, whose owne accurate search and exquisite explications of Scriptures, Fathers, and primitive practises, did there both breed wonder & astonishment in that noble and learned audience, and also gine singular satisfaction (even to the Agones for the Opposites) touching all the exceptions taken to the Church-state; which his Majesty now found to bee no other then the phantasies of a scrupulous indiscretion.

(24) The Wednesday following, being the 18. of Ianuary (appointed for the next meeting) his Majesty againe, with most of the Lords of his Privy Councill, entered the Chamber, where the Reverend Prelates with such others only as the L. Archbishops appointed, (for so his Majesty commanded) being admitted to his Royal presence, after some conference about the High Commission court, Subscriptions, Oath ex officio and the like, his Majesty (causing the other foure Diuines to bee then called in) was pleased to declare what formerly had past; and for a conclusion, that vp all with a godly exhortation, like another Constantine, perswading every man to vniue, and to a diligent discharge of their duties, that in several places the Papists to gouerne without violence, the inferiours to obey without murmuring, and all of them to builde Gods Temple without found of discord; defining and commanding all present, not only themselves to labour that way, but to be a meanes to draw on all others vnto a peaceable conformity; the matters being no other (as now hee saw plainely) but of meer weakness: wherein persons discreet would doubtlesse bee easily henceforward reclaimed, and for the unaffected & rebellious, their roomes were more behouefull then their seruices; by their fruites therefore He should discern and iudge them; Obedience and Humility being the markes of honest and good men, which thenceforth hee would expect from as many as would be held well affected to his Majesty and his State. Which princely exhortation (delivered with much more feeling words, and moving earnestnes) was so piercing as it fetched teares from some of both sides, and all unanimously protested their most dutifull obedience to those his Royall commands.

(25) Besides this maine fruit of this famous conference, the settling of the Church-peace, sundry other important matters (not here to be pretermitted, because necessarily tending to that noble end) were therein also provided, and by his Majesties euer provident care had then their conception, though after-times brought the birth to perfection. The first (both in due ranke and vie) was his sacred Decree for a new Translation of the holy Scriptures, vpon a princely and pious care of Gods eternal Truth according to the Originals; as also for an vni-form reading thereof in the Churches. To which end three selected Companies from Oxford, Cambridge and in London, most industrious in the language and learning being employed, after long conference, much trading, and diligent comparing of all translations with the ancient originals, it is now most exactly and happily published, as a witness to the world both of Gods constant promise, that Heaven and Earth should perish, but his word should neuer; and also of the Religious care of this his Vicegerent, in seeking even at the first, the best thing that man is commanded to seek after, whose praise shall stand for ever in the Record of thar godly worke, and the worke shall iustifie it selfe against all gainsayers to Gods eternal glory, and many foules great comfort.

(26) His second sacred proiect was, that as now in England, so also in Ireland, Wales, and the Northern parts, true Religion (which Hee there sowed to bee the only band of true diuines) might be thoroughly planted. Which religious purpose Hee so zealously prosecuted, especially for the North and all Scotland, as that He held it not sufficient to haue ioynd these two Kingdomes into one Temporal Monarchy, vntlesse He might see them both vniue also in the Doctrine, Regiment and Rites of one spiritual Hierarchy. Neither was his princely wisdom for the meanes lesse conspicuous then his zeale in the intendment, in making so heedfull chioice of such English Diuines, as were (not long after) in this employment sent into Scotland; the very first, in which Apostolike Ambassage for establishing those Neighbour-Churches was he, whose eminency both for Place and Piety, is now worthily famous in guiding our owne; and whose blessed travels in that seruice, as they were acceptable to God, his Majesty, and that Nation; so are they a document to others, how powerful & admirably successful true Learning is, where it is guided with true Prudence, and where Piety and love of Gods glory is linked with Charity, and zeale of mans good.

(27) This great business and conference so royally accomplished, his Majesties next care was (herein also as another Constantine) to perpetuate the maintenance of this flourishing Church (whose peaceable estate hee had thus provided for) with the reuenerence of her ancient foundations; as also to establish statutory lawes for the peaceable government of his people; to which purpose a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, the 19. of March, wherein, for the Church it was enacted, that neither Archbishops nor Bishops should alienate, assure, giue, grant, demise, or in any sort convey, no, not to the King himselfe, his Heires or Successors, any of the Honours, Castles, Manors, Lands, Tenements or Hereditaments, being parcell of the possessions of his Archbishops or Bishops; and If any so were, to bee utterly void and of none effect, notwithstanding any former law, statute, act, or ordinance to the contrary.

(28) Foure dayes before this Parliament commenced, it pleased his Majesty, with the most noble Queene Anne and the most illustrious Prince Henry, attended with glorious troopes of great Peeres, Prelates, and Counties, to ride in triumph through the City of London to Westminster, the houses beautified with rich hangings, the streets adorned with goodly Trophies and Pageantes, of severall nations inhabiting, the rayles on both sides covered with blew cloth, the severall Companies honourably addressed, and ranked vnder the displayed Ensignes and Armes of their severall Trades and Sciences; the one shewing the wealth and state of the City; the other, the body of the Citizens and government, and all making manifest the vnspokeable joy they conceived to receive their great Sovereigne into this His City and Imperiall Chamber. In pledge of which their exulting joy, vnfaired love, and vowed fidelity, the Standard at the Crosse in Chespe, both gratulated his Majesty with a pithy speech in the name of the City, and wishing him a golden reigne, presented his Graciously with a cuppe of gold, deliv'ring another likewise to the Queene, and a third to the Prince, which were all no lesse graciously accepted, then most lovingly presented.

(19) Neither lesse was his Maiesties desire to retaliate the Citizens and other his Subjects true affections, when recounting the great hinderances of Marchandizing and Navigations of traffick, by reason of the long continued breach betwixt England and Spain, his royall heart tending his Subjects tranquillize, endamoured to close againe those wounds of discord with the sweet balme of Peace; which was solemnly proclaimed in London, August 19. the sea being made open to Merchants for their free commerce.

(20) Both Domestick and forraine affaires thus pleasantly composed, as his Maiesty was the first, who in this last age of the world held the Scepter of the whole Island in his royall hand, so to vntie the two sides vnder the name of one entire Empire, and the two Nations into a ioint blessed unity; Hee caused himselfe by Proclamation to be entituled King of Great Britaine, according to the ancient name of this Isle before the Saxons Conquest; the restoring of which name againe, many foredooming spirits had anciently preiaged, as now wee see effected. Vnto which Imperiall title, are rightly annexed the kingdoms of France and Ireland, rightfully belonging by birth and Conquest vnto the Crowne of England.

(21) Two other Proclamations afterwards came forth; the one for the Banishment of all Iesuites & Seminary Priests, one of the land, and the other to confirme the Ecclesiasticall government, and Booke of Common Prayer, in the same forme and estate, as Queene Elizabeth left them; to the no little griefe of the workers for Rome, whose designs began now to facke in such position, as in the venting whereof, not onely the earth might haue trembled vnder the wright of such moethers, but euen the heavens be affronted and confounded, to giue those Serpents the breath or benefite of aire. Vnto which bloody, horrible and odious act to God and man any stile must now turne: a matter indeed so distastefull for mee to remember, or to write of, that it abhorres any very soule to fill the penne with ink, or to blotte the paper with these blacker spots of darkness, and de-formers of Englands faire face.

(22) The plott was to vndermine the Parliament house, and with Gunpowder to blow vp the King, the Prince, Clergy, Nobles, Knights and Barges, the very confluence of all the flower of Glory, Piety, Learning, Prudence, Authority in the land, fathers, sonnes, brothers, allies, friends, foes, Papists, and Protestants, all at one blast. A tresageime inuented by him, that blows the bellows of destruction, fashioned in the forge of the bottomlesse pitt, put in practise in a vault of darknesse, and forwarded by him, that is the father of darkenesse, and in darkenesse I could wish it might euer dwell, whose life was neuer reuelled to the light of the Sunne. Their intent, when that religious achievement had bene performed, was to surprize the remainder of the Kings Issue, to alter religion and the State, and to bring in forraine power. Sir Edmund Baynes an attainted person (who stiled himselfe Prince of the damned Crew) was sent vnto the Pope, as he was a temporall Prince, to acquaint him with the Gunpowder-treason; a fitt soile indeed to bee employed betwixt the Pope and the Diuell.

(23) This treason was first set on foot in the last yeere of the late Queenes raigne, when Henry Garnet the Superior of the Iesuites, Catesby and others leat Thom as Winter into Spain to negotiate with King Philip in the name of the English Catholikes; first, to send an army vnto them, who now were in a readinesse to ioyne their Forces with his; secondly, to grant some pensions vnto sundry persons deuoted to his seruice in England: and thirdly, to giue advertisement of the discontentes that the young Gentlemen and Souldiers had conceiued vpon the death of Essex, whereby a most fit occasion was then offered to forward the common cause. To prosecute which business, he made for his means father Cresswell the Leiger Iesuite in Spain, Don Pedro Francisco second Secretary to the State, and the Duke of Lanna, a great Counsellor to the king; all of them being said to haue affixed this commissioned Ambassador, that the office of his imployment would bee very grateful to their master.

(24) The place for landing concluded vpon by these wise Scallits, was Kent or Essex, if the Kings Army were great; if otherwise, then Northford Haven in Wales was held fitt: with these and other like complots, Winter all that summer followed the King in his Progress, and laitie had answer by the Count Miranda, that his King would bestow a hundred thousand Crownes towards the expedition, halfe thereof to bee paid that present yeere, and the rest in the next Spring, when (as the farthest) hee meant to set foot in England, on whose behalfe hee willed the English Catholikes to maintain their promise, whom hee respected (as was auided) as his owne proper Callians: And further desired their continuall advertisement, if in the mean time it chanced the old Queene to die.

(25) Winter thus laden with hopes, returned from Spain, and emphatically made into the bosoms of Garnet, Catesby, and Treloar, and they vnto others, all of them tickled to heare the news, rested fully satisfied, expecting the day. But before the Spring-time was fully approached, that Morning Seate, and Mirror of her Sexe, did set in our Well, the thrice glorious Elizabeth, who had now iudged Israel full forty foure yeeres in admirable tranquillity, as in her raigne wee haue sufficiently seene. To signifye whose death Christopher Wright was from Catesby and others sent into Spain, and Guy Fawkes likewise was posted thither from Arundell by Sir William Stanley, both of them to prosecute the former negotiation, assuring the Spanish King, that King James meant to runne the same course, and to proceede as rigorously against the Catholikes, as the late Queene had done: for whose defence they instantly desired that some Spaniards might bee transported vnto Northford-Hauen, where the Romilish-minded would bee forward to assist them, having in a readinesse two thousand horse furnished for the enterprise. But King Philip aduelling poizing his honour, as his zeale for Religion, and observing a great difference betwixt States in hostility, and of Kings raigning in friendship, hee in no wise would list to invade England, or further to proceede in any forcible enterprise.

(26) In the meane while the Iesuites had been tampering to dissuade the acceptance of King James into England, vrging it for a Maxime, that death was to bee endured, rather then to admit an heretike (so it pleased them to rearme the Lords annoyed) and those that giue him consent they held lyable to Excommunication by the censure of Pope Clement the eight, who had liberally bestowed vpon his fauored person the names of a Puritan, an Heretike, a Calvinist, a Persecutor of Protestants, and another Iulius Apostate.

(27) The Romanists thus loosened from their Anchor-hold of Spain, and left by that Pilore to shaft for themselves, now perceived their owne error in their long expectation, That change of State would change Religion: but hee now gone, whose life they had often said for, and her godly Successor now hit inferior to her for aduancing the Gospel: their hopes grew desperate (as these desperates alledged) and no other means now left them but onely to kill the King, whom they fallily calumniated to haue broken his promise for a toleration in Religi-

Religion, as Watson and Percy had disguised among them; yea, and a fraudulent message was sent to the Pope by the Scottish Secretary, that K. James would become his obedient sonne. But how false his religious heart was to their aspirations, appeared both by Watson himselfe, who, condemned to die, took it upon the salvation of his soule that he could not draw the smallest comfort from the King for a toleration of the Catholics, but that himselfe had imparted his words in a milder tone than his Majesty meant them, only to keepe (as he excused the matter) the Catholics in love and duty unto the King: and since by the Lord of Balmorisc (Secretary to the King in Scotland) who acknowledged his offence, hath been arraigned and found guilty of death, for dealing letters, and sending them to Rome, which himselfe cunningly got signed in passing them amongst others, his Majesty being verily ignorant of the Contents.

(38) Upon which false suggestions, the Atheistical position of Catesby was grounded, who held it for an Axiome as father Parsons had taught: That the whole Schoole both of Divines and Lawyers make it a position certain, and to be undoubtedly believed, That if any Christian prince whatsoever, shall manifestly turne from the Catholicke Religion, and desire to forsake to reclaime other men from the same, hee presently forfeiteth all princely power and dignity and that also by vertue and power of the Law it selfe both divine and humane, even before any sentence pronounced against him by the supreme Power and Judge. And that his Subjects of what estate or condition soever are freed from all bond of oath of Allegiance which at any time they had made unto him as to their lawfull Prince. Nay, that they both may and ought (prouided they haue competent strength and force) cast out such a man from bearing rule among Christians, as an Apostate, an Heretike, a Backslider, and Reuelator from our Lord Iesus Christ, and an enemy to his owne State and Common-wealth, Iell perhaps hee might infect others, or by his example or command turne them from the faith. Yea one steppe further else where is flood upon, that if any Prince shall but fauour or shew countenance to an Heretike, hee presently loseth his Kingdome. And thus they conclude, that for Heretike a Prince is to be deposed, and his kingdome to be bestowed at the pleasure of the Pope, for whom the People upon paine of damnation are to take part and fight: out of which detestable conclusions arose the first lincke of the Gunpowder Treason.

(39) For the Parliament dissolved the seventh of July, and proroged untill the seventh of February following, Catesby being at Lambeth, sent for Thomas Winter, who before had been employed into Spain, and brake with him then for blowing up of the Parliament house: who readily apprehending it, said, that (indeeds) franke at the rote: once they helpe were wanting, a house for residence, and a man of skill to carry the Mine; but the first Catesby assured him was easily to be got, and for the man hee commended Guy Fawkes, a sufficient soldier, and a most forward Catholicke. But frank (quoth hee) because no peaceable way of shall be ventred, you shall owe to the Constable, and create him to sollicite for Justice at his coming into England, that the penall lawes may here be repealed, and the Catholics tolerated and ranked with his other Subjects.

(40) Winter thus poised to negotiate with the Constable, found him at Bergen neere Dunblow, and by the means of Owen the fugitive Traitor, delivered his message; a whole answer was, that hee had a strict command from his Majesty to doe all good offices for the Catholics, and for his owne part hee found himselfe bound in conscience not to omit any good occasion that might forward their cause: although indeed hee did but temporise as Sir William Stanley told Winter, for the great desire which the Spaniards had that the Peace might proceed with England. Where upon Winter (hopelesse that way) returned for England, bringing with him the foresaid Fawkes, a fine instrument for so diabolical a designe, and comming to Lambeth, told Catesby that the Constable was not the man whatsoever were his words, and that all now in these parts were bent for a conclusion of Peace; which sounded so harshly in his ill-nerved eares, that his braines became more buified about his impious Project, and his mind in continual trauell to bring forth that sinne, which hee had most vanatiously conceived.

(41) Robert Carr, John Wright, Thomas Winter, and Guy Fawkes holding a community in their mischiefs till about London; about the middell of Easter-Terne, Thomas Percy as hote as the Harbour himselfe to forward Rebellion, came putting to Catesby lodging in Lambeth, and the first word hee spake was this: What Gentlemen shall we aduise be talking, and neuer doe any thing? you perceive (I know) how things doe proceed. To whom Catesby answered, that something was resolved upon, but first an Oath for secrecy was to be manifested. For which purpose they appointed to meet some three daies after behind S. Clements Church without Temple-barre, where being met, and falling in Conference, Catesby alleged that this last Parliament had left the Catholicke-likes in as much danger as they stood before, & that now the peace with Spain was rather a meane for harder lawes to proceed, then those in force against them to be abrogated; so that the ancient Romish Religion, & the Catholicke professors thereof must now be enforced to bid England adue, if Gentlemen of power and repute should thus give way to the contrary proceedings, or thus make nice how to helpe, or where to beginne: at which speech Percy made present answer, himselfe was the man that would vndergoe the Catholicke cause, were it with the slaughter of the King, which hee was there ready to undertake, and doe.

(42) No Tom (said Catesby) thou shalt not adventure thy life to so small purpose, if thou wilt be a Traitor, there is a plot to greater aduantage, and such a one as can neuer be discovered: and thereupon all of them taking the Oath of secrecy, hearing the Message and receiving the Sacrament, Catesby told them his diabolical device, which was by Gunne and Gunpowder to blow up the Parliament house, and at one stroke with the destruction of many, effect that at once, which had become many yeeres in attempting. A matter easily performed (as hee vrged) if men of resolution would thereunto bestow their paines and their paines; and moe it sure from suspicion of discovery, the designe being so estranged from the conceits of men: wherein hee also obtained that religious father was thirty of reuenge, euen vpon the same persons, and in the same place, whence hee first recited the vniuersal lawes enacted against her. For sake of conscience to kill the Innocent with the no-ment, hee told them it was warrantable by the authority of Garnet himselfe, the Superior of the English Iesuites, and of Gerrard, and Tessmond (Jesuitical Priests likewise) who by their Apollitical power did abolish and commend the fact, which for the aduantage of the Catholics was to be executed; they said though with the death of some Innocents, rather then the seruile blood quicke, the necessity of time and occasion for requiring it. The Oath was given them by the said Gerrard the Duels Attorney in this business: the forme whereof was as followeth.

You shall sweare by the blessed Trinity, and by the Sacrament you now purpose to receive, power to disclose directly or indirectly, by word or circumstance, the matter that shall be propoised to you to keepe secret, nor desist from the execution thereof, untill the rest shall give you leave.

turning forth of the County, found Perce rooms appointed for the Scottish Lords to meet in, there to so that they feared (for that presen) to intine their

Robert Catesby
Thomas Percy,
John Wright,
Guy Fawkes.

(45) The Moles that first underwent these vnder-minings, were Robert Catesby Esquier, the moning Arch-traitor, and ruine of his name, Thomas Percy Esquier, kinsman and actedant vpon the Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Winter, John Wright and Guy Fawkes Gentlemen, all of them grounded schol-lers of the Romish Schoole, and such earnest labouers in this their Vault of Villany, that by Christmas Eue (which very day might haue remembered them of more Christianu works) they had brought the worke vnder an entry, vnder the wall of the Parliament-house, vnderpropping still as they went the earth with their framed Timber, nor till that day were they seene abroad of any man.

The Traitors consented how to perce the their intentions.

(46) During this vndermining, much consultation was had how to falsen the rest of the busines, after the deed should be accomplished, and many questions propounded and argued at full, before they could puch on a fered resolution. The first was how to surprize the next heire to the Crowne; for though they doubted not, but Prince Henry would accompany his Father, & take his lot with him, yet they feared lest D. Charles (being absent, as too young to attend at Parliament) would escape their train, and perchance be so carefully guarded, and attended vpon at Court, that hee would hardly bee gotten into their hands. Of which first tub in their way, Perce offered himselfe to bee the first remouer, and shewed his meanes, which was, that with some other Gentlemen, hee would enter the Dukes Chamber, which by reason of his acquaintance hee very well might doe without any suspicion: and others of his like acquaintance should bee placed at several doores in the Court: so that when the blow was giuen, and all men in a maze, then would hee carry away the Duke, which hee presumed would be easily done, the most of the Court being then absent, and the present altogether vnprauided for to make resistance.

Duke Charles was intended to be surprized.

(47) For the surprize of the Lady Elizabeth, it was held a matter of farre lesse difficulty, the remaining at the Lord Harington, and Abbey (Catesby house) neer vnto her, whether vnder a shew of Hunting, diuers Catholicks should bee gathered, who having the advantage in knowing for what purpose they were assembled, had the full liberty of that distracted time, to provide money, clothes, armour and other abilliments of warre, vnder pretence of strength

The Lady Eliz,
was intended to be taken from the

to guard and secure the heire apparant.

(48) Then it was discusse, what Lords they should come from the Parliament, where it was agreed, that they should keepe thence as many as they could that were Catholicks, or that way flourishing: all others to feeble the limar, and the imputation of the Treason to be callt vpon the Parliament, to make them more odious to the world.

The fawkes consented to make the treason to fawkes Prince.

(49) Next it was controuersed what foraine princes should be made priuy to these their purposes; for to enioyne them to keepe, or to oblig them by oath, was not in their power: & to ally their likes or dislikes, would proue dangerous. For if any of them approved the design, their preparation might beget suspicion: if not then the feares of discouery would extinguish the enterprize, no man daring to proceed further therein. Spain was held the fittest to second their attempts, but hee was too slow in his preparations, & France too neere and too dangerous to be dealt with, and how Holland stood affected to England they all very well knew. But in the midst of these troubles and minings vnder-ground, the Parliament was againe adioyned till the first of October ensuing, vpon which Proclamation they brake off both discourt and worke till the feast of Saint Maris Purification. At which time they layde in powder and other provisions, and then beganne againe to worke, having taken into their company Christopher Wright and Robert Winter, both of them sworne, and receiving the Sacrament for secretie. The wall (which was very hard, & nine foot thicke) with great labour they wrought halfe through, Fawkes being their Centinell to giue warning when any came neere, that the noise in digging might not be heard.

The Parliament
againe proposed.

Robert Winter,
Christopher Wright, both of them sworne.

(50) The labourers thus working into the wall, were suddenly surprized with a great feate, and casting from them their digging tooles,ooke to their weapons, having sufficient of shot and powder in the house, being fully resolved, rather to die in the place, then to yeeld or be taken. The clank of their feare was a noyse they heard in a roome vnder the Parliament house, vnder which they meant to haue mined, directly vnder the Chaire of Estate. But al now at a stand, & their countenance call each vpon other, as doe befall what would bee the issue of this their enterprize: Fawkes scowled forth to discri (if hee could) what was done abroad, and finding all life and free from suspetch, returned and told them, the noyse was onely a remouall of coales there: now vpon tale, and that the Cellar was so belee, which would bee more commodious to their purpose; and would also spare the labour in the Mine. Whereupon Thomas Percy vnder pretence for storage of his winter provision of wood and coales, went and hired the Cellar, which done, a new countenance was had.

The feare of the Traitors.

(51) Wherein Catesby found the weight of the whole too heauy for himselfe alone to support, for besides the maintenance of so many persons, and the seruall houses for seruall viues, lited and payde for by him, the Gunpowder and other provisions would tise to a very great summe, and inderede too much for one mans purse. Therefore he desired that himselfe, Percy, and some one more might call in such others as they thought fit to helpe to maintain the charge, alledging that they knew men of worth and wealth, that would willingly assit, but were not willing their names should bee known to the rest. This his request they approued as necessary, and withall succoring farther to digge in the Vault, knowing the Cellar would be of better vic for their designs, they remoued twentie Barrels of Gunpowder into that room, which they covered with a thousand of Billets, and fise hundred of faggots, for that now the lodging roomes were cleared of all suspicious provisions, and freely might bee entered without danger of discry.

(52) But the Parliament being againe proposed

rogued until the fift of November following, these forsaide underminers of our State and happinesse thought fure they should againe (for a while) disperse themselves (matters being already in so good forwardnes) and that Guy Fawkes should go over to acquaint Sir Willd Stanley, & McKinch Owen with these their proceedings, yet so as the oath of secrecie should be taken of them. For their policy was to have Sir William Stanley preference so soone as the dismal blow should bee given, to bee a leader to their intended stratagems, whereof (as they thought) they should have great need; & that Owen should remain where hee was, to hold correspondency with forraign Princes, to allye (in much as hee might) the odiousnes of the fact, or to impore the Treason to the Puritanes discontents.

(53) Fawkes coming into Flanders found Owen, unto whom, after the oath, hee declared the plotte, which hee very well approved. But Sir William Stanley (at that time in Spain) Owen said would be hardly drawne into the businesse, for that hee had sutes in the English Court himselfe, yet hee promised to forward him in all that hee could, and to send him into England with the first, when their proiect had taken effect. Whereupon Fawkes to avoid further suspition, kept still in Flanders until the beginning of September, and then returning, received the keyes of the Cellar, and laid in more powder, billets and fagots, which done, hee retired into the Countrey, and there kept till the end of October.

(54) In the meane while Catesby and Perry meeting at the Bathe, it was there concluded, because their number were but few, that Catesby himselfe should have power to call in whome hee would to aide their designe: by which authority hee tooke in Sir Edward Digby of Rutlandshire knight, and Francis Tresham of Northamptonshire Esquier, both of them of sufficient estate and wealth, had they not abused both to their owne destruction: for Sir Edward offered fiftene hundred pounds to forward the action, and Tresham two thousand. But Perry disdainng that any should out-run him in eale, promised foure thousand pounds out of the Earle of Northumberland rents, and tenne hories of speed to speed them when the blow was past. Against which time to provide munition, Catesby likewise tooke in Ambrase Rookwood and John Grant two Reculant Gentlemen, and vndoubtedly others were written in the same Roll, had these two grand Electors beene apprehended alioe, whose owne tongues only could vntold their Catalogue Record.

(55) The businesse thus forwarded by their complices abroad, their Invitations did not neglect the supplies at home. For Perry, Winter and Fawkes had stored the Cellar with thirty fixe Barrells of Gunpowder, and vpon them bestowed (in stead of shot) Barres of Iron, logges of timber, massie stones, Iron Crowes, Pickes-axes, and all their working tooles, and (to coner all) great store of Billers and fagots, so that nothing was wanting but fall in a readinesse, attending that great and terrible day. Neither were the Iesuiticall Priests slacke on their parts, who usually concluded their Masses and oblatory Sacrifices, with their prayers for the good successe of the expected hopes, as by these verses, made and vied by Garnet is to be seene.

Centum anseris persilam credentium de fasibus, Vt Christo laudes debitas persilamus alacris.

And others thus, Propter Lord their paines that labour in thy cause day and night, let Herrie vanish away like smoke, let their memory perish with a cracke, like the ruine and fall of a broken house: Allusion upon belittle to the labours in the Vault, the mounting smoake of powder, and the fall of the Parliamene house, which if it had hapned, they might have said to have bin Prophetically foretold by their high Priests for that yeere.

(56) But the Lord that neuer slipp the delueance of his elect, kept his his Israel as the Apple of his own eye, & this put digged for the destruction of others, they fell into themselves: so that we may wel say, if the Lord had not bin on our sides when we rose up against you they had finalised us up quicke, when their wrath was kindled against you, but praised bee the Lord which hath not given on a prey unto their needles: Isaiah is escaped out as a bird out of the snare of the fowler the snare is broken, and we are delivered. For this Conspiratrice egge hatched by themselves proued a Serpent onely to themselves, and themselves (by Gods hand) made the only Instrumens to breake the shell of their owne treason.

(57) For vpon Thursday in the evening, tenne dayes before the intended Parliamene, a letter directed to the Lord Admonteagle was deliuered by an vknowne person vnto his footman in the streete, with a freight charge given, to give it into his Lords owne hand, which accordingly hee did. The letter was without date and subscription, and somewhat vnlegible, so as the Nobleman called for one of his seruants to assist him therein, the strange contents whereof much perplexed the true construction, as whether writ by some Papist to scare him from attendance, or as matter of consequence from aduise of some friend. Howsoeuer, though it were fupper time, and the night as darke as the purpose of the letters yet to discharge his loyal duty, hee forthwith repaired to the Kings Palace at Whitehall, where he imparted the letter to the Earle of Salisbury, Principall Secretary, and they both prekenly acquainted the L. Chamberlaine therewith, who deemed the matter not a little to concern himselfe, the charge of his office being to ouerser all places whether his Maiesty was to reside, these two Councillors shewed the same letter to the Earles of Warwiche and Northampton, who together concluded (how sleight soeuer the contents seemed to appeare, as proceeding from some fumes of an idle and light braine) to acquaint the King himselfe with the same, which accordingly was done, and was as followeth.

My Lord, out of the love I beare to some of your friends, I have a carref for your profectioun. Therefore I would aduise you, as you tender your life, so desire some excuse to fuff off your attendance at this Parliamene. For God and man haue concurred to punish the wickednesse of this time. And thinke not flugely of this aduertisement, but retire your selfe into your Countrey, where you may expect the oute of safety. For though there bee no appearance of any stirre, yet I say they shall receive a terrible blow this Parliamene, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme, for the danger is past so fume as you haue burnt the letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, to whose holy protection I commend you.

(58) His Maiesty a while pausing, & then re-reading the letter, deliuered his iudgement, that the stile thereof was too quicke and prythe to bee a libell bred from the superficialities of an idle braine, and on the instant did apprehend by these words: that they should receive a terrible blow at this Parliamene, Or yet should not see who hurt them, that a sodaine danger by blast of Gunpowder should be intended by some base villaine in a corner, no insurrection, rebellion, or desperate attempt appearing. And therefore wished that the vnder rooms of the Parliamene house might bee thoroughly searched, before himselfe, or Peeres should sit therein. To which purpose it was then concluded, that the L. Chamberlaine should (according to his office and place) view all the rooms above and below: but aswell to stay idle rumors, as to let things ripen to reucale their own mysteries, this his search should bee deferred until Monday, the day immediately before the Parliamene, & then to bee with a seeming slight eye, to avoid suspition.

(59) The Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine, according to the conclusion, vpon Monday in the after-afternoone (being accompanied with the L. Montegle, who still thirited to fee the illue) repaired vnto thole vnder-rooms, and finding the Sellar fo fufficiently floored with wood and coales, demanded of Faulkes (the counterfeite Jahonson, who stood there attending as a feruant of small repute) who owed the place; his answer was, that the lodgings belonged to M. Thomas Percy, and the Sellar likewise, to lay in his winter prouision, himfelfe being the Keeper and M. Peries feruant. Whereunto the Earle as void of any other fufpition, prefently replied, that his Maifters was well prouided againft Winners blafts: but being come forth, the Lord Montegle told him, that hee did much fufpect Percy to bee the inditer of the letter, knowing his affection in religion, and the friendship betwixt them profefed, fo as his heart gaue him (hee faid) when hee heard Percy named, that his hand was in the act.

(60) The Lord Chamberlaine returning related to the King in prefence of fome Counsellors, what hee had feene: and the fufpition that the Lord Montegle had of Percy, and himfelfe of Jahonson his man, which prefently encreased his Maiefties apprehenfion and leafoine, whereupon hee infifted, that a narrow fearch fhould be made, and thole billets and coales fhould be turned to the bottome, which as hee confidently fuppoſed was the couering of fome notable intended treaſon. But ſome moued the doubt how this fearch fhould be made: for albeit no caution could be too much in fo great a danger, yet the indurment therunto, being no more then a nameleſſe inſcript, theſt no man knew whence, and might well be the euaporation of an idle brain, would ſeeme (if nothing were found) ſome ſcandal vnto the State, to bee oſer ſuſpitions of fo frivolous a toy, and withall might leaue ſome ſad imputation on a great counſellor of the land. Norwithſtanding, his Maieſty ſtill perſiſting in his former opinion, willed that the fearch ſhould be thoroughly made, and no poſſibility of danger left vnexamined, vntillſe they meant to goe to the Parliament, and leaue the hazard to the euent, which hee thought they in conſcience were loth to doe. Whereupon it was concluded, that the fearch ſhould be made but vnder color of ſearching. For certaine hangings belonging to the houſe which were miſſing, and conſeied away.

(61) Sir Thomas Knoeet, (now Lord Knoeet, then a Gentleman of his Maieſties Priny-Chamber) was employed herein, and about midnight (before the very morning when the Parliament was to beginne) went vnto the place with a ſmall but well affected company. At the doore of entrance into the Cellar, finding one (which was Guy Fawkes) at ſo vnreaſonable a time, cloaked and booted, hee thought fure to apprehend him, and entering the place, ouerturned the billets and coales, when preſently hee found the Serpents neſt, ſtoored with thirty fixe barrels (ſmall and great) of gunpowder, then ſearching the villaine that ſhould haue hatched the egges, found about him a darke lanterne, three matches and other inſtruments for blowing vp the powder: who no whit daunted, inſtantly confeſſed his guiltines, and was ſo ſure from contrition or repentance, as hee vowed, that had hee been found within the bouſe (as indeed hee was then but immediately come forth from his worke) hee certainly would haue blowne vp the bouſe with himſelfe, and them all: & was ſo obduerate in his Romiſh reſolution, that being brought before the Lords of the Council, hee lamented nothing ſo much, as that the deed had not been done, ſaying, that the Diuell and not God was the diſcouerer of the plot.

(62) As deſperate were Cateſby, Percy, and the reſt, who hating nothing that the L. Montegle letter did giue ſome ouerture of ſuſpition, yet would they ſtay to ſee the ſucceſſe, and forſooke not London vntill the ſame day wherein the deed ſhould haue bene done: Cateſby, Percy, Rookwood, both the Wrightes, and Thomas Winter, poſſed all into Warwickſhire, where Grant and his affociates had taken certaine great horſes out of a ſtable, to forward their hoped great day. Theſe meeting at Dunſborough, where Sir Eſmerald Digby had made a march for a ſeruanting, not with hounds for the hare (which was only the colour) but with Norwood for blood, and ſurprize of the moſt vertuous young Princeſſe Lady Elizabeth, were told (by the eſcaped) of their certaine diſcouery, and preſently ſcared with report of puniſhment, when ſtricken with terror, not knowing where to make ſtay, or whether to flie, they deſperately beganne an open rebellion, preceeding the cauſe was Religion, and admitting for truth, that all the Catholikes throates were appointed to be cut. And ſo trooping together, wandered through Warwickſhire, the edges of Worceſter, and borders of Staffordſhire, their ſeruantes and aiders being about fourſcore men, & thole oer ready to ſeale away from them, more care was in keeping, then truſt repoſed either in their faith or defence. Yet thus ranging, and finding no reſiſtance, they rilled the Lord Arundels houſe of ſail the Armour, ſhot, powder, and other warlike prouifions, but the weather rainy, and the waters ſome what high, the powder in carriage took wet, and thereby became more vnſerviceable, God in his iuſtice fo ordering the ſucceſſe, that the element of water, and accident of fire fought againſt them, as the ſtars in their courſes did againſt Sifera.

(63) For their laſt fort of refuge, being Elſbach in Staffordſhire (the houſe of Stephen Littleton) whether Sir Richard Wals (high Shiriffe of Worceſterſhire) purſued them, who thinking the ſtore no greater (though ſo great enough) then ſome fray or riot, ſent his Trumpet vnto them, commanding to render themſelues vnto him his Maieſties (Minifter, with promiſe of his beſt merces (if they did) to alay the offence. But their owne conſciences witneſſing what the Shiriffe knew not, told them the fault was too waighty to leaue them any hope of ſanctity: and therepon returned anſwere, that hee had neede of greater diſtance then of theſe few numbers that were with him, before hee could be able to command or controul them. So preparing for reſiſtance, they made ready their weapons and having laid two pound of the ſaid powder in a plaſter to drie in the chimney, one (a Millar) comming to amend the fire, threw in a billet, wherewith a ſparke flying out, chanced to fall on the powder, whoſe ſodaine blaſt was ſo violent, that (though being of ſo ſmall a quantity) he blew vp the rooſe of the houſe, and ſcorched the bodies and faces of Cateſby, Rookwood and Grant, with ſome others, whoſe conſciences then ſtricken with the guilt of their ſinne, made them ſee Gods ſearching iuſtice in puniſhing like with like. Thus being deſtroyed with the accident, and now knowing that all was loſt, like deſperate men, they there reſolued to die together, ſet open the gate, inſtitered the Shiriffes followers to ruſh in among them, and by valour (as they ſeamed it) fought for their owne deliueration; for both the Wrightes were therein ſhot downe dead, Ambroſe Rookwood, & Thomas Winter were very fore wounded, and laſtly, Cateſby and Percy reſolutely fighting, backe to backe, were both of them ſlaine with one bullet of market-ſhot.

(64) Thus theſe high aſpiring ſpirites, deſeiced with the ſpirit of illuſion, vnder opinion of religion, and dreaming of no leſſe then deſtruction of King, Princes and people, with alterations of kingdomes, Church and State, were miſerably deſeared, not by humane providence, but diuine mercy. Some preſently ſlaine in heate of Rebellion, others deadly wounded were taken alive, the reſt either whole or but lightly hurt, wered priſoners to London, and to other places, all the way gated ar, reſeiled and deſtroyed by the common people, as ſome ſtrange Monſters of the world, forth in their helliſh and horrible Treafon, and lully condemned & executed as they moſt worthily deſeared, whoſe induements, arrangements and confeſſions, I referred to read in the true

(65) In memory of which great deliniance, the fifth of November (the day appointed for mercies destruction) was by authority of the same Parliament enacted to be for ever celebrated with thanksgiving, prayse and prayers vnto our heavenly Protector, and to bee kept holy vnto the Lord through our generations, which we wish may bee obserued, with no lesse acknowledgement of Gods infinite mercies to vs-ward, then was among the Iewes, the institution of their Purim, for their deliniance from the practise of wicked Haman, that so our Temples being thus freed from their prophane idolatry, wee may euer make this day as the scall of our dedication, like to the Altareber, who in the same moneth did institute theirs, by cleansing Gods Temple of heathenish pollutions. So shall Christ with his spirituall approach beautifie this Church of ours, as with his humane presence in the Temple at Jerusalem he celebrated that Winters feast of theirs: wherein hee taught that himselfe was the true son of God, and the only dore by which all must enter. Through which therefore let vs with Jeremy approach his Altar to make supplications for the Kings peace: and with Zerach to pray for the Kings life, and life of his sonne, that their dayes may be vpon the earth as the dayes of heauen, their branches as the beauteous Olive, & their roots fastned as the Cedars of Lebanon. (67) In offering of which Sacrifice my selfe (his Maiesties loyall seruant) hold vp my hands towards Heauen, for His continuall preleration, His noble Queens felicity, their Royall Issues prosperitie, our Churches Peace, and Great Brittaines euer flourishing State: and doe at this place (as of most note & eminency) end my many yeeres trauels, hitherto purpockly continued, that this last foule blot of infamy, though it cannot vnto be wiped away, yet may it bee somewhat vailed, and lie obscured in this hundredmost frame of out now finished Theatre: that so, when any mote noble, and more enabled spore and penne, shall attempt to continue and enlarge the life and raigne of this mighty Monarch, our learned and wise Salomon, hee may adorne the frontispiece of so glorious a worke, with some porch and entrance of more pleasing aspect. For my part, I haue here onely pointed at His Maiesties full entrance and acts, rather to shew a liberty of writing the kingdomes affaires, which neuer is permitted, saying vnder good Princes, then by my vnable performance to enter into that which requires the pen of some iudicious Tacitus, or eloquent Zenophon, and conclude with the actiue of Amianus Marcellinus the famous Historian: Let other men for experience more sufficient, and for learning better known write the rest, whom, if it shall please them to enter thereupon, I aduise to frame their penne into an higher stile.

A summary Conclusion of thevvhole.

By the assistance of the All-Sufficient (the onely defence and Preserver of man) my insufficient abilities, have attained the end of this worke, and my weake vnable Person brought to a Period this large Edifice of GREAT BRITAINS THEATRE. How acceptable to others, I know not; but with what paines and travail to my selfe, my decayed strength too manifestly hath felt, and with what care of truth, the Authors allegred through the whole Proesse, are my witnesses; whose lines haue bene the measures, and Antiquities the master, that hath railed the Fabrick vnto this height. The attempt was great, and tarre vnfit (I must confesse) for me to vndergoe; which, even at the first entrance was so obscured by the ludicious, and in the continuance hath so proued: that now it being finished, as the Silkworme endeth her life in her long wrought clew, so I in this Theatre haue built my owne Graue; whose Architecture howsoever defective it may be laid to be, yet the proiect is good: and the cost great, though my selfe haue freely bestowed this paines to the Presse, without pressing a penny from any mans purse. For me to shew the vtilitie of History, were to light a dimme candle before the bright Sonne; or to prescribe a methode for their vices, were, with Phormio to reade a Lecture of Chivalrie vnto great Hannibal, warres experienced Conductor: But, as our owne concer-neth vs nearest (wherein my pen hath taken the freest access) so let me abridge the whole in a small Circle, and incompass that briefly, which hath bene related in a farre wider circumference.

(2) Our Land, peopled from Japhet the first sonne of Noah, fell vnto those sonnes of Gomer, who inhabited these parts of Europe, whose issue were most famously knowne by the name of Britaines. At first, naked, rude, and ignorant of the true God; yet no sooner were frequented with the ciuill Romanes, but that they covered their Cut-painted bodies with Garments; and shortly imitated them even in their most civilized actions; yea, scarcely was Christ taken downe from his Crosse but they became Christians (the greatest glory of any Nation) and among them the Gospel had her first progresse by established authority. Their Government was vnder Kings, and those of as honourable a respect, as were any other in these West-parts of the World, both in training their Subjects vnto due obedience and ministering of Lawes for the maintenance of estate. Their warres domestike and forraine were so managed with Politie and valour, as in the one they valiantly defended themselves against their assaults, and in the other freed the Romanes in most of their Conquests; which cost them lastly their owne subnersions, when their warriers and virgins were consumed and transported into other parts, whilst their native Land lay exposed to the will of Inuaders.

(3) The glory-thirsting Romans (from a crew of lawlesse Shepheards now lately become Lords of the World) were the first that set foot, with dispaigned Ensigne, for the Conquest of Britaine, and the same first assailed by Julius Caesar from the Coasts of Gallia. Which his attempt was so honorable in effection of their Emperors, that Claudius (the fifth in succession) holding the Triumph but bair, that attends upon authority without action of Price, made choice of Britaine to adorn his triumphant Chariot, that this Land (sired, as was thought, in another World, and but part thereof shewed by Caesar to the Romans) might adde remembrance of name to his forgetfull Person; and to that end, having made hither himselfe, stamped his Conquest upon his Coines thus, DE BRITANN: and upon his aged knees crept vpon the flepes of the Capitoll, to give thanks of victory vnto his gods on the day of his Triumph, which, though for a small part of this Lands subjection, was yet accomplished with more then ordinary magnificence, and the shewes greater then usually had beene scene, for the Conquests of farre larger and better knowne Kingdomes. And with as greata care was it kept, whilst the Romans kept their owne greatness. But when their high-mounted Pillar ouerflew her owne Base, and the farspread boughes were growne too weighty for the stlemme, many hands at once grasped at the Empericall Crowne, and all of them together tare the Branches from the Body of that faire Tree. By whom also the faire and flourishing Cedars of Britaine were shaken, and left naked both of fruite, and leafe. So that now the glory of the one declined, and the beauty of the other vnto decayed, and neither of them able any longer to support their owne standings, gaue place vnto dynasty that would now haue both downe; whereby the Tewell so much desired, and which had beene kept with such care, was now laid at stake to them that could winne it, and Britaine abandoned by the Romans, without further claime, after they had bene Lords thereof the space of fise hundred yeeres.

A summary conclusion

(4) The next Actors vpon Britaines faire Stage, were the Saxons, a people of Germany, fierce, bold and irreligious, as, for the most part, the rest of Nations in those daies were. These infelting with Piracies the Coasts of Britaine and Gallia, grew both fearful and famous in profession of military seruises. In France they fixed vpon the Countrey of Bataueria, in Germany by intrusion they vnto the Sueuians; in Holland and England, they inroached vpon the Batesians, and Cumbria Cherisians (now a continent of Denmarke) they made the place of their aboad. From whence they often assailed the Coasts of this Land, when whilst the Romans held it for theirs, and were often put backe by Sulpho and others, whose praises the Past Claudians chaunted abroad. But the Romans departed, and Britaine left bare of men, their land waled by famine, tumultuous vprores, and by bandings of Great-ones who should be graue; the Suits and Picts (ancient Enemies to their Peace) took the advantage, and continually made bloody incursions into their Land. And albeit alone-wall was raised a ward the whole Continent, to impeach their inroades, yet that assailed little, their assaults were so great. Whereupon the Saxons were sent for, and in their first seruice freed the Britaines from those raging Picts: The Lands defence then they vnderooke, and the Inhabitants consented to maintain the charge, which whilst it was in giuing was thankfully received, but once received was vngratefully forgot. And they (like the Ramens of Arabia, who so long as they are full, yeeld a pleasant noife, but being empty make a horrible cry) emptied faster then the Britaines could fill, and euer complained they had not enough, till fillly by surprize they got all into their owne clauies. Then decided they among themselves the best of the Land, and droue their Receiuers into the worst and waste mountains of Wales, euer of their Captaines shuing a part to himselfe, and of one Empericall Crowne made fiseuen Diadems to adorne their owne heads; which long were not worse, without intestine wares, each of them striving to enlarge his owne, vpon his next, till God and destiny againe brought all vnto One, euen to great Egbert, who forbade the Lands old Name, and commanded these now vntied Provinces to be called Angla. Yet no sooner was this accomplished, with assured hopes conceived, that the Saxons glory should thence forward ascend and spread forth with peace, but that a sinage nation, as fierce as the Seythians, call their eyes of desire vpon that beautiful Crowne, and presently attempted, but neuer intermitted any bloody cruelties that could forward the same, all they had set on their owne Helmet; and these Saxons wore out with resistance, gaue place to the Danes, when time had worn out fise hundred fise three yeeres of their Government.

(5) These Danes thus succeeding (though with no better right to enjoy) were a stout sturdy Nation whose many Piracies both France and Britaine had many times felt, before they attained the end of this their Goale. For these, multiplying like Bees in the Hise, the land of their owne natiuitie was too little for each to haue a part: vpon which occasion a confome was practised to banish some that the rest might haue roome. These Exiles therefore (chiefly consisting of their youth) fell vpon other Landes with no lesse danger, then the falling of a sword out of the sheath, and greedously wounded whereoeuer they fell; but no where more deadly then in England. Which for two hundred and eightene yeeres continuance they vnfeinly assailed; sometimes harrowing the Countrey before them, and carrying away great Booties to their Ships: sometimes impoverishing the People, by exacting great summes of money for composition of Peace: sometimes expelling the Inhabitants, and seating themselves in their places: and sometimes fluing the Countrey with their Kings, and taking vnto themselves none of the worth; but not as other Conquerors to build, wall, and plane, but to lay waste, call downe, and destroy, sparing neither Erections for civil vic, nor places of Oratory dedicated to diuine. Yet the Garland once gotten by their King Canut, was worse with great glory, and by three of those Danish Kings, Englands Crowne was enioied. The first of them Potent, religious, wife and iust. The second, illegitimate, an vnsurper very agill, but idle: And the third a Tyrant, a Taxe-raiser, lasciuious and a glutton, in which excess he at Lambeth he suddainely ended his life, when the Land became cleared of the Danes fore oppressions, after they had a long time attempted, and their Kings for fise and twenty yeeres space wore the royal diademe of this Realme.

(6) These foure Nations fulfilling their times by Heavens assignement, in gaining, keeping, and againe loosing, the rich Garland of GREAT BRITAINES government: a fife, inferior to none, made thereto a double clime, and by a third (more sure then both) which was their conquering sword, got it. These last (which I pray may be last) were the Normans, a people fierce and valorous, whose many Sea-adventures were so great, in the daies of Charles the Great, as then he wept to foresee the harmes they would doe to his in France, which pruned so many that Charles the Bald (his Grand-child) was forced to part with the Estrieome of Chartres vnto Hasting a Norman; Charles the Greffe with the Countrey Norfolke, vnto Godfrey their Chieftain; and Charles the Simple with all the Countreys which lay betwixt the Rouer Seine and Loyre, vnto Rollo their Leader, whereof he became Duke, and that Dutchie from him named Normandy. Whence William the Bastard the seventh in descent, in a bloodie field at Battle in Sussex, won the Englisch Crowne from King Harold that held it: where, by changing of Lawes, dispossessing of Nobles, and bestowing the Lands Reuenues vpon his, he laid the foundation of a glorious Monarchie. At first, somewhat bloodie, (as Conquests commonly proue) and the

The Union of the whole Island is the wish of our Sovereigns.

Crowne banded for, among brethren and kindred (as what will not the desire of a Diademe doe?) the two younger brethren successively wearing it, to the prejudice of their *Elder, and Stephen hauing no right, but such as Intruders pretend. But Henrie Plantagenet placed on the Throne, and three hundred thirty one yeeres taken vp in the Reignes of foureteene Kings of his line, their Aets afforde matter of more Princely consequence, their Dominions spread wider, themselves being the lawfull Inheritors to the third part of France, and to the Whole by the Title of their third Edward, and by the Conquest of their fifth Henry. And surely had not the civil diffinitions of Lancaster and Tork spent their weapons in the wounds of themselves, those Kings and their Successors undoubtedly had beene double crowned vnto this day. But these Rafes plack off by diffinitions hands, and their Branches come downe in home-bred broyles, their tollall rootes lay as it were dead in the Earth, till Tender of Lancaster with Plantagenet of Tork gaue them vigor and sappe, by binding both together in wedlocke a golden band. Whereby also the long dead stemme of the sanctest British Kings beganne againe to bud forth, and five renowned Princes of that Sirname succeeded in Englands Throne. The first of them, the richest, and wisest King of this Welteme-World, The second, the foret wonder of the Papall authority, The third, the forwardest in all pious aeties, The fourth the feracietull for the Religion of Rome, and The fifth a Mayden-Queen, the most famously renowned among the Worlds Monarkes, vnder whose reignes one hundred and fixtze yeeres were fully complete and run. And were it not that the English are taxed to be ouer-much addicted vnto vaine Prophecies, and that Nero was prohibited by decree of Councell, I might alledge his, and that of Aquila at Shafesbury, both of them foretelling that the British Emperour after the Saxons and Normans, should returne againe to his ancient Steele and Name. Notwithstanding Truth bids acknowledge, how fittre God hath accomplished both these in the royall Person of our now-Soveraigne, the one by his descent from the loines of that Royal Tender-King Henry the Seventh, and the other, by his Edict, in restoring to the Land her ancient Name, Britannia: himselfe being the first Monark of the two Kingdomes Vnion, and the greatest of Command, since Constantine the Dane. The Cordes of whole Royal Ties, we pray, may be further extended, that those naked Virginitas may be covered vnder the Curtaines of his most Christian Government; and that the Scepter of his Peace may bud as Aurora Red in his hand, and in the hand of his Sonne, and Sonne Somers, so long as the Stemme and Moone endureth.

(7) Then, then (worthy Reader) are the Heads, whence have issued such plentiful Springs, that now met together in one Body the Stream is grown very bigge, which thing I ever feared, but could never prevent, offending rather with the Negard who thinke that every mite too-much, then sinning with the Presbiter in superfluous exesse, so plentiful is our Story, and so largely requires it to be writ. Through all which my weakle body with many yeeres labour hath alone travelled, aswell in the reviewing of the Geographicall parts of the Land, as in the compiling of the succeeding History, though far unable to perfect either, according to their owne wishes. But lest the weight of the whole should rest vpon so slender a proope as my selfe: I have laid my buildings vpon far stronger arches, as by the many alleged authorities may appeare. For first, the Chards for the most part traced by others, and most of them disiald vnto view, were the foundations of my bequene paines; in supplying their wants with my many additions, and dimensions of the Shire-townes, and Cities true platforms. The further descriptions of sundry prouinces, I haue gleaned from the famous workes of the most worthy and learned Cambden, whose often sowed seeds in that Soile hath lately brought forth a most ptegerous harvell. For the body of the Histories, many were the manuscripts, notes, and Records, where with my honored and learned friends supplied me; but none more (or so many) as did the worthy repairer of ea-
